Bathurst, Hon. S., Treasurer to Government, Malta	-	1,560

'Few persons have evinced a more exemplary appetite for the public money, than Lord Bathurst. His Lordship's family has mostly been in the receipt of 10,000l. or 12,000l. a-year, from fees, pensions, and taxes. He still retains two valuable sinecures, his son William Lennox one, and an office nearly a sinecure, and his son, Seymour Thomas another. Within the last few months he has been strenuous in his efforts to obtain firmer hold; first he tried to superannuate his second son, who had been a couple of years in the Victualling Office, as a retired commissioner; failing in that, he next with the most indecent precipitancy, and almost by absolute force, thrust him into the office of the late Mr Buller, as Clerk of the Privy Council. If one did not know that the assurance of men is mostly in the inverse proportion of their deserts, one would be surprised at the pecuniary audacity of this nobleman. Lord Bathurst is notoriously a person with the least possible claims to public honour and emoluments; he is altogether without talent; a most feeble, awkward, and puzzled speaker; and in every sense of the word, a most trifling personage.

'Ellenborough, Lord, Chief Clerk of Court of King's Bench - - - - -	£9,625

'This amphibious lord is also Custos Brevium of the King's Bench; an office held jointly with Lord Kenyon, who receives the emoluments during his life. Both offices were given to Lord Ellenborough by his father, the late High-Prerogative Judge. Justice may well be dear, when fees can be levied on suitors to support such monstrous judicial sinecures.

'Farnborough, Lord, Pension on the 4½ per cent. [West India] Duties, 1801 - - (Charles Long, a rich man, who always held lucrative offices, without a family, and no claim whatever on the Barbadoes Planters.)	£1,500
Goulburn, Right Hon. H., Pension as late Irish Secretary, July 1825 - - -	2,000'

'The late Chancellor of the Exchequer seems better qualified for the management of ecclesiastical than secular affairs, of which the Tithe-composition Act is an example. Such a specimen of imbecility, folly, and mystification, as his speech on the introduction of the Civil List this session was never before presented to Parliament. To expatiate on the frugality of the late King in not having exceeded his income! Why, had he been HELIOGABALUS himself, and supped on diamonds, he could not have dissipated his immense revenue. Then to talk about the inexpediency of separating the various items of the Civil List expenditure, lest the Radicals should discover the personal expenditure of the monarch, and thence institute invidious comparisons between royal and republican institutions—what inanity! All these matters are now thoroughly understood by everybody. Only read our chapter on the Civil List and the economy of George IV, and the cost of a KING will be as clear as daylight. But ought it to be inferred from thence we are unfavourable to monarchical government? No! we know too well what is, to think for a moment of what de novo might be; we know, too, that though the key stone is not the arch, there could be no arch without it—at least not a Gothic arch!'

'Grafton, Duke of, Hereditary Pension out of the Excise Revenue - - - £7,200.
Ditto, ditto, Post Office ditto - - - 4,700.
Sealer of King's Bench and Common Pleas - 2,888.

'This is one of the four illegitimate descendants of Charles II, raised to ducal peerages. It might be right in this King to quarter the produce of his debauchery on the people's industry, but it is with surprise and indignation we find it continued to the present day. How happened it the revolution Whigs of 1688 did not rid the country of this infamy? The present Duke returns two or three members to the lower House: he is said to be an "excellent gentleman."—Whether the motto, Et decus et pretium recti—"the ornament and recompense of virtue," refers to the pensions or descent of his Grace, it is not easy to determine.'

'Howick, Viscount, son of Earl Grey, and M.P. for Higham Ferrers; under Secretary of State for the Colonies - - - £2,000.

'The Greys are crowding thick upon us; we have already chronicled half a dozen or more, brothers, brothers-in-law, sons, and sons-in-law of the Premier. Somebody must fill official employments, and it is natural for a man to prefer his own, and no one can blame him when the claims of candidates are equally balanced, but it is rather unusual for so many members of a family to be qualified for offices, and some of these offices of great trust and responsibility. Lord Howick is a young man of promise, but hardly experienced enough to grapple with the many perplexing questions involved in colonial affairs. The Whigs, however, seem bent on repeating those practices which for so long a period turned the public stomach against them, and made the very name stink in the nostrils of the people. During their short turn of nine months, in 1806, their rapacity exceeded all former example, and never before was witnessed such a precipitate clearing of the public offices to make way for friends and dependents. Earl Grey was then First Lord of the Admiralty; his brother and four more Greys received very lucrative appointments; one was sent out Commander-in-Chief to the Cape of Good Hope, with a salary of 4,000*l.* per annum, and another salary of equal amount as Lieutenant-Governor, though, under such circumstances, the salary of a Lieutenant-Governor had never been more than one or two hundred pounds But this was not so bad as giving two reversions to Lord Erskine's favourite clerk, and filling, with their party connexions, the situations of collectors of customs, surveyors of the customs, waiters, and searchers, at Buenos Ayres, a place not then in our possession!'

'Manchester, Duchess Dowager of, compensation allowance for loss of the office of collector of customs outwards, held by the late Duke of Manchester - £2,928.

'Here is a curious case—a dowager duchess, ninety years of age at least—receiving compensation for loss of office as searcher of customs! What services can this lady have rendered? Her husband was known some fifty years ago as a court lord, and if the marriage was improvident, why must the widow be quartered on the public? Has not a labourer's or a mechanic's wife an equal claim? Must we have a pauper nobility to support the dignity of the crown? Why is she not maintained by her son, the late Governor of Jamaica; or her grandson, Lord Mandeville, who married a rich heiress?'

'Mornington, Ann, Countess Dowager of, pension on Civil List, July 1813 - - - - £600

'By the Powers! Here is the Prince of Waterloo's aged mother, Anne Hill, among the state paupers. This is too bad, at any rate. We always knew the Duke was fond of money, but we did think he would provide for his parent. It is not less a reproach to his brothers, Wellesley, Maryborough, Cowley, and Gerard-Valerian, the Prebendary of Durham, all of whom have been receiving not less than 40,000*l.* a year, and yet to suffer this venerable progenitor to be maintained out of the taxes, is infamy past endurance. What a griping set they must be! Arthur was always thrifty and provident, and there are persons in London in possession of a pressing letter he addressed, at the commencement of his career, soliciting a very humble office under the Irish Government as a permanent provision.'

'Newcastle, Ann, Duchess Dowager of, pension on Civil List, 1803 - - - - - £780.

'We have recounted several countesses and a marchioness, and this is the second pauper duchess. There is an act of Elizabeth, which renders it imperative on children, when of sufficient ability, to maintain their parents, and we see no reason why the Duke of Wellington, the Duke of Manchester, and his Grace of Newcastle should be exempt from its operation. Mr Sadler, who purposes trying his hand at the poor laws, will not, we trust, suffer this matter to escape attention, and his Newark patron be compelled to discharge his filial obligations.'

'Nelson, Earl, pension, by Act of Parliament - £5,000.

'Brother of Admiral Nelson. A striking instance this of the injustice of hereditary honours. The present possessor, a Norfolk parson, could have had as little claim to the rewards of the hero of the Nile, as any other chance person picked up in St Paul's Church yard.'

'Short, Charles, Clerk of the Rules and Orders of the Court of King's Bench, from fees - - £5,172.

'We are not exactly acquainted with the official duties of Mr Short, but the nature of them and the sources of his vast emoluments require investigation. It is curious to remark, that the greatest portion of public taxes is levied on articles of general consumption, and paid by the industrious classes; and the emoluments of the most lucrative judicial offices arise principally from fees paid out of the property of bankrupts, insolvents, and imprisoned debtors.'

'Tierney, Mrs. pension on Civil List, 1830 - £400.

'Widow of the late M.P. for Knaresborough, and who, if in need of assistance, ought to have obtained it from the wealthy banker, her relative; or, if not from him, from the Duke of Devonshire and other party connexions of her husband. But aristocracy is the grave of virtue. The rich lords, like the rich clergy, immersed in luxury and dissipation, are strangers to sympathy with indigence and misfortune. They do not even provide for the destitute of their "order," and seldom come forward to support any work of utility or benevolence. There are exceptions among the nobility, but this is the general character of the corporation; all useful, meritorious, and charitable undertakings are planned, supported, and executed by the middling and industrious classes. It is the same in Ireland, as we learn from the Parliamentary report of last session; there, all institutions for the education of the people, and for their relief in sickness and old age, have been established, and are supported, not by the absentee landlords, bishops, and pluralists, but by the farmer, the poor tenantry, and tradesmen. But can there need further proof of the vicious nature of aristocracy in church and state, than the deplorably ignorant and destitute state of our agricultural population? Of the hundred and thirty-eight miserable creatures on the Berkshire calendar, only twenty-five could write, and only thirty-seven could read; yet, in face of this evidence of the neglect of the people by their "natural protectors," Justices Park, Vaughan, and others of the Special Commissioners, would insinuate that the clergy and lords of the soil had done their duty, and that the risings of the peasantry did not proceed from want of food or want of education, but from the wicked machinations of seditious writers, itinerant lecturers, and foreign incendiaries.'

'Wellington, Duke of, pensions out of Consolidated Fund - - - - - £8926
Constable of the Tower - - - 950
Colonel of Rifle Brigade - - - 238
Colonel of 1st Regiment of Foot Guards - 2695
Lord Warden of Cinque Ports - - 295.

'Our readers may have observed in the course of this work, and previous to the fall of the Duke, that we dropt several laudatory expressions in his favour. The fact is, we were pleased with the energy with which he had carried through the Beer Bill, the Catholic Relief Bill, and the bill for the abrogation of the Test Acts, and we firmly believed him to be, if not a foe to a job in his own person, or that of his friends and family, a determined foe to jobs in others. Hence our gratitude; we flattered ourselves the Duke might prove a judicious and patriotic statesman, as he had shown himself a successful military commander. All our hopes have been grievously disappointed, and after the demonstrations made by the Prince of Waterloo of his capacity and views, since the meeting of Parliament, we have no hesitation in ranking him among the most incapable of ministers and the greatest enemies of our country and mankind.

'In his foreign policy, the Duke is the stedfast partizan of the Holy Alliance; in his domestic policy he belongs to the Tory faction; that besotted crew of plunderers, possessed of neither common sense nor common honesty, and whose demon ascendancy of forty years has entailed on the empire all its calamities. Agreeably with the views of this party, the Premier had prepared to open the Parliamentary campaign. Retrenchment was to proceed no further; the principle of free trade was not to be persisted in; judicial, ecclesiastical, and above all, parliamentary reform, and everything new or novel was to be repudiated or discountenanced. Abroad, the continental system was to be upheld,—the idle treaties of 1815 maintained inviolate,—and after a million of bayonets had been silently assembled on the Rhine, the Moselle, and the Adige, the kingdom of the Netherlands forcibly re-established, and the liberties of Frenchmen subverted by another victory of Waterloo. Such was the train of mischief laid by the Field Marshal! One hundred millions more to be added to the debt,—the dead-weight doubled,—and Europe deluged with blood, that half-a-dozen crowned conspirators might be guaranteed in their usurpations over the rights and liberties of the human race. * *

'It is astonishing how the Duke could hit on such a mistaken course of policy. Would none of the parasites, pensioned dowagers and demireps, who haunt his steps, open his eyes? Even Sir R. Peel might have told him England is not in the state it was in 1793; that there has been a complete revolution in public sentiment; that an individual is hardly to be found who is not convinced of the blunders, profligacy, and misgovernment of the last half-century; and that all classes, rich and poor, are either dismayed by the overwhelming embarrassments of the system, and quiescent in its defence, or the open and determined partizans of its thorough reform. Under such altered circumstances, what a brainless project to think of reviving the Pitt system,—resorting to Algerine Acts,—appealing to persons of property,—and coercing the entire population, the most favourably disposed portion of which is resolved to be neutral, and all the rest in fierce and determined opposition.

'It is hardly worth while enquiring how far the Duke participated in the plans of the miserable Polignac. The wretched outcasts would not have sought shelter here, had they not been previously apprised of the spirit of those who presided over the public councils. Subsequently, the ex-Premier has been pleased to designate the glorious three days, a "bad example,"—an opinion, no doubt, he shares, in common with Prince Metternich, and the Autocrat of Russia. France had not much to gain by her immortal triumph; she had only to defend, not to conquer free institutions. Her first revolution had swept away an oppressive tithe system, a privileged noblesse, a feudal game-code, and a plundering and barbarous judicial administration. Would to God our revolution of 1688, had done as much for us, and then we should not have still to struggle through the Augean stable of aristocratical, legal and ecclesiastical abuse!

'We shall leave the Duke with a fervent prayer that he will never again be Premier of England. His ideas and sentiments are wholly alien to the happiness and liberties of Englishmen, and we verily believe his return to power would be the signal for a general rising throughout the United Kingdom.'

THE STAR SYSTEM.

TO THE TATLER.

Mr Tatler,—Your correspondent Peter Pencil appears to have written to you under the influence of very kind and liberal feeling; but, I think, without considering the principal object for which the play-bills are printed, viz. the information of the public. There seems to me good reason, apart from any wish to gratify certain actors, why the names of some of them should be printed more conspicuously than those of others; for as the characters represented are confessedly of unequal importance, one is naturally more desirous to know who are to play the principal characters, than who are to play the subordinate; an object best attained by the distinction hitherto adopted, and which I venture to suppose was adopted from that, and not a less charitable motive. The guiding principle should be the relative importance of the characters in the play,—a distinction obvious to readers and play-goers, few of whom, having Richard the Third in their minds, think equally of the Duke of Glo'ster and the Duke of Norfolk; and certainly little anxiety is ever manifested to know who shall perform such parts as the latter. This indifference is reasonable, and is attributable to the inferiority of the part, not of the actor; on whom, however, it should operate as a stimulus to additional zeal in his profession, since by performing inferior parts well, he may hereafter entitle himself to claim parts of more consequence. These minor parts are, at present, too little attended to by actors; and it would seem to be as difficult to get the ordinary attendants well represented, as to find a good Romeo or Hamlet.

I cannot assign the importance of the subject as a good apology for troubling you, even at this length; but time and place often regulate that matter; and as your love of the right in great things does not make you inattentive to it in small, you may perhaps deem these lines, in a theatrical point of view, as not unsuitable or unseasonable in the Tatler.

Your constant Reader,

India Rubber.

[Our correspondent, with his ingenious name, is very welcome; but we think Peter Pencil remains, unrubbed out. From what we know of the readers of play-bills, it does not appear to us, that they care in general for the distinction alluded to. If they know the play or the actors (and those who know the one, are likely to be acquainted with the other) the distinction is not necessary to them; and if they do not, it conveys to them no information for which they are prepared by any previous knowledge on theatrical points. The point is at all events very doubtful; while the abolition of the custom would do away with much heart-burning and partiality.]

Armenian Jollity.—The Armenians, like the Turks, never take their women out with them in their parties of pleasure:—these are composed exclusively of the privileged sex, and amusing things they are! They get their heavy bodies carried to some open spot in the country, by horses or asses; there they cross their legs and sit down, and gorge in unsociable silence. When their meal is over, they take their cup of coffee, and light their eternal pipes, which they keep smoking till it is time to return home. All their amusement concentrates in this—they have no idea of pleasure beyond smoking; and the only variety they know is occasionally to substitute the Persian pipe for the usual chibook. (These parties are called Keffs) Keff is a Turkish word, in use by all classes of Levantines,—it signifies, what in my school days, we used to term "a jollification." It applies admirably in this sense to the Armenian parties!—Mac Farlane's Constantinople.

Adelphi.

There has been a falling off, during the last few weeks, in the minor pieces at the theatres. Bringing Home the Bride, or the Husband's First Journey, which we saw here last night, appears to be from the French; but if so, either the original is less sprightly than is usual with the productions of our pleasant neighbours, or their fancy helps out an author in a manner unknown to audiences in England; for the new piece dragged a good deal, in spite of the acting of Reeve, the Yateses, and Mrs Fitzwilliam. And though it rallied towards the conclusion, there was an impresssion of disappointment in the house. This impression was the stronger, from the promise with which it set out. There was a wedding-day, with Mrs Fitzwilliam and her simplicity for the bride, Yates for a gay young lawyer introduced to her by an over-confident husband, and Reeve for the husband, with his bridling burliness, his hollow back, large calves, lax small-clothes, rumbling countenance, and joints loose in the hinges. This bride and bridegroom,—he all in white and drab, and she in riding-coat and a great white hat,—take leave of the gallant hand-kissing lawyer, and the innkeeper their father, with a great favour pinned to his breast, and ascend into a gig with a real horse to it, which is brought on the stage, to show how lively and true everything is going to be. And so far, so good. But the progress is poor enough. The gig runs away; the bridal couple lose one another, and go making enquiries of everybody for the lost object of their affections: the husband returns home to pass a cheerless night, and get scolded by his father-in-law in the morning; and the wife meets with a young lawyer in the rain (Mr Yates), who makes love to her, takes her to a tavern, and all of a sudden finds his angry master before him; to wit, the gay attorney himself, who sends his young rival home, and follows with the lady himself. An imperative call to attend a client forces him to quit her: he leaves her to the care of his sister; and in a little while the spectator finds the parties assembled at the house of the bridegroom, who is profuse in his acknowledgements.

We have nothing to add, except that there are some songs which are set to popular airs,—one or two of them not unamusing.

Ingenious Reckoning.—Madame de la Fayette, the accomplished romance writer, at the age of 39 said, "I reckon still by 20."

Pleasure from a Right Source.—The same lady said to Segrais, that of all the praise she had received, nothing had pleased her so much as two things which he had said,—that her judgment exceeded her wit, and that she loved the truth in all things.

Importance of Minding your Q's.—Ramus, in 1551, was appointed one of the Royal Professors of Rhetoric and Philosophy. Soon after, he had to take part in a singular affair. About a year before his appointment, the professors had begun to correct some abuses which had crept into the pronunciation of the Latin language. Some ecclesiastics concurred in this reform, to the infinite chagrin of the doctors of the Sorbonne, who carried matters so far as to deprive an incumbent of his revenues, for having pronounced quisquis, quanquam, according to the new reform; and not Kiskis, Kanham, according to ancient usage. The incumbent having appealed to the Parliament, the Royal professors, particularly Ramus, fearing that he would sink under the credit of the Faculty, thought themselves bound to support him; they therefore sought an audience, and represented in so lively a manner to the Court the indignity of such a process, that the accused was absolved, and left at liberty to pronounce the words as he pleased.—[The character of Ramus was altogether an estimable one. He seems to have entered on his enquiries with the single view of arriving at the truth, and giving it welcome, without regard to its agreement with his prepossessions, or its consequences to his future fortunes. He was bred a Catholic, but subsequently embraced the Protestant religion, by which he rendered himself an object of persecution; and, at length, after a chequered life, he became one of the victims of the infamous massacre on St Bartholomew's Day, in the year 1571.—F. THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

THURSDAY, MARCH 3, 1831.

On Monday next, The Tatler will begin to admit Advertisements, but under such an arrangement of its letter-press as will take nothing from the reader.

This opportunity may be particularly worthy the attention of those who deal in commodities conducive in any way to the Graces of Life, whether intellectual or external, such as Books, Music, Paintings, Engravings, Sculpture, Apparel, Jewellery, and all kinds of Fancy Articles; in short, anything connected with habits of elegance and refinement.

The space of The Tatler devoted to this purpose will be of necessity a great deal smaller than in other Daily Papers, so that every Advertisement will be sure of being seen; and Advertisers will bear in mind, that as the readers of the paper consist of Play-goers, Men of Leisure, Actors and Actresses, Accomplished Women in general, the Lovers of Books, Music, &c., and other cultivators of social intercourse and amusement, they form the very description of persons who are the most likely to repay the use made of its columns.

Advertisements received at the Tatler Office, 4 Catherine street, Strand; also by Mr G. Reynell, Country Newspaper and General Advertising Office, 42 Chancery lane; and by Messrs C. and W. Reynell, at the Printing Office, 45 Broad street, Golden square.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

Sonnets and Fugitive Pieces. By Charles Tennyson, Trin. Coll 12mo. pp. 83. Richardson.

Poems, chiefly Lyrical. By Alfred Tennyson. 12mo. pp. 154. Effingham Wilson.

[Concluded from No. 153.]

We resume our extracts from the Poems of Mr Charles Tennyson.

The 21st Sonnet, "On Startling some Pigeons," has something very pleasing in the first eight lines, and noble in the two last. The "sober chiding" of the pigeons, with the character given to it in the eighth line, is true to verisimilitude, and gives us a sort of smiling respect for the gravity assumed at the moment by the sympathy of the young Poet:—

'A hundred wings are dropt as soft as one,
Now ye are lighted—lovely to my sight
The fearful circle of your gentle flight,
Rapid and mute, and drawing homeward soon:
And then the sober chiding of your tone
As there ye sit, from your own roofs arraigning
My trespass on your haunts, so boldly done,
Sounds like a solemn and a just complaining!
O happy, happy race! for tho' there clings
A feeble fear about your timid clan,
Yet are ye blest! with not a thought that brings
Disquietude, while proud and sorrowing man,
An Eagle, weary of his mighty wings,
With anxious inquest fills his little span.'

The only objection we have to make to this Sonnet, is a fear that the beautiful birds whom it addresses are not quite so blessed as the Poet thinks. We remember being startled some years ago with a French work upon pigeons, which informed us that they are extremely pugnacious and jealous creatures, and that the turtle-dove is in the habit of thumping his mate. It is impossible, however, not to suppose that any race of creatures in a healthy condition are not far happier than otherwise.

The commencement of Sonnet 22d is delicate and picturesque:—

'See'st thou her blushes, that like shadows sweet
Pass upward from the silence of the heart,
Avowing its fond dream by token meet—
Their crimson traits dissolve; but not depart
The hopes they usher to the lover's breast.'

The exordium of the next has a graceful subtlety:—

'I trust thee from my soul, O Mary dear;
But ofttimes, when delight has fullest power,
Hope treads too lightly for herself to hear,
And doubt is ever by until the hour.'

The third and fourth lines of Sonnet 25, entitled "Martial Ardour in Age," make the imagination assume a lofty aspect:—

'And if ye marvel that mine eye doth glow,
Now every pulse of fervid youth is lost,
Ye never heard the kingly trumpets blow,
Nor felt the fieldward stirring of a host.'

This is like Chaucer,—

'- - - - - their horses freshly stirring,
With bloody soundis of the trumpets loud.'

We are glad to see, however, by another Sonnet on "War," that the author's heart misgives him as to the propriety of exalting these appeals to animal force. He says,—

'The tide of things should flow less troubled, sure;
To clear its current sages do impart
Their fruitful streams, and the wise Poet's heart
Pours in its crystal tribute, bright and pure!
But still doth war present a mighty lure,' &c.

We believe that the respect for war and warriors has much decreased of late, especially since the mistakes the latter have made in legislation, and the animal nature they seem to have exhibited, compared with the intellectual of the new leaders of mankind; nor do we conceive that wars in future need be more inevitable, than squabbles and boxing-matches among the men who were accustomed to them when little boys. But the poets, till lately, may certainly be charged with having contributed to the old delusion. Perhaps it was their business to adorn and make the best of a necessity. But when doubt comes among the wise, it is a signal that necessity has ceased.

THE OCEAN.

'The ocean at the bidding of the moon
For ever changes with his restless tide:
Flung shoreward now, to be regather'd soon
With kingly pauses of reluctant pride
And semblance of return:—Anon from home
He issues forth anew, high-ridg'd and free—
The gentlest murmur of his seething foam
Like armies whispering where great echoes be!
O leave me here upon this beach to rove,
Mute list'ner to that sound, so grand and lone,—
A glorious sound, deep drawn and strongly thrown.'

Those lines marked in Italics are fine.—Here is a gentler sonnet, and deeper-thoughted,—"On the Love of Home:—

'Hence with your jeerings, petulant and low,
My love of home no circumstance can shake,
Too ductile for the change of place to break,
And far too passionate for most to know—
I and yon pollard-oak have grown together,
How on yon slope the shifting sunsets lie
None knew so well as I, and tending hither
Flows the strong current of my sympathy;
From this same flower-bed, dear to memory,
I learnt how marigolds do bloom and fade;
And from the grove that skirts this garden glade,
I had my earliest thoughts of love and spring:
Ye wot not how the heart of man is made:
I learn but now what change the world can bring!'

DEATH.

'Plac'd at the limit of all mortal being,
The mute unquestionable shadow stands.'

A CHURCH.

'There duly, as the merchant to the mart,
Come aged men, whom daily deaths make fewer.'

The next couplet is not so "unquestionable" as death:

'There all the spirit of a Christian heart
Is bodied forth in gentle rites and pure.'

That surely depends on the doctrine taught. If anything of Calvin or Athanasius be there, we should say that the "Christian heart" could not be very easy at hearing it. We look upon the following as by far the best of the pieces in which religion is introduced. The thought is novel and entire: it does not overlook anything: its sincerity equals its amiableness: and there is more hope for the world in this sort of charity, than in that which begs a question for the conventional:—

THE ALTAR.

'How fondly look'd I on the place,
Assigned to rites of spousal love!
How saintly seemed that board of grace,
With Jesus blessing bread above!

'Twas bosomed in a kindlier air,
Than the outer realms of care and dole;
A sacred spirit brooded there,
Whose spell like silence lull'd the soul!

'For though full oft the accents dear,
Here uttered, had been falsely fond,
Still they were breathed and plighted here,
And broken in a place beyond!'

No. 42 is a good Sonnet on a Captive. The particularity about the birds, in the last three lines, has a lively air of circumstance. Every morning the poor prisoner

'Heard the stir and song
Of birds in royal gardens far below,
Telling of bowers and dewy lawns unseen,
Drenched with the silver steam that night had left—
Part blossom-white, part exquisitely green,
And ringing all with thrushes on the left,
And finches on the right, to greet the sheen
Of the May-dawn; while he was thus bereft!'

Our author, in Sonnet 43, far over-rates the genius of Sir Thomas Lawrence, who, after all, was but a clever, a showy, and a flimsy painter, spoilt by crayon-drawing, fashion, and hasty wants. His pictures want both soul and body; and are destined to perish, like the generation he painted. The following stanza, at p. 69, would have frightened him:—

'When Kings demand, with haughtiest aim,
Beyond their weight of kingly claim,
With worthy scorn and anger stirr'd,
We fill the balance with the sword.'

Voila la Congres (of his portraits) dissout!

We do not like the translations from Anacreon. They are of the literal and simple order, which is a better mistake than that of the florid; but the more we consider Anacreon and the ancient lyrics, the more we are persuaded that some degree of paraphrase is necessary, to assimilate them in effect to the original. We are to recollect, that the ancient odes were written to be sung to music; that the poet himself was the first performer; and that the idea of words and music was probably never divided in the mind of the reader. The spirit of enjoyment is a spirit of continuousness. We may suppose what we like of Greek simplicity and brevity, especially in their epigrams or inscriptions, the shortness of which was most likely prescribed, in the first instance, by the nature of the places on which they were written: but we may be pretty certain, that the shortest of Anacreon's songs was made three, or four, or five times as long as it appears to us, by the music with which it was accompanied. Take a song of Metastasio's, as set by Arne or Mozart, and we shall find the duration of it a very different thing in the study and the theatre. The only true way, therefore, of translating an ode of Anacreon, is to sympathize as much as possible with his animal spirits, and then to let the words flow as freely as they will, with as musical and dancing a melody as possible, so as to make the flow and continuity of the verse as great a substitute as we can for the accompaniment of the lyre. The only versions of Anacreon, in the English language, that are really worth anything, are those of Cowley; and these are as paraphrastic as they are joyous. We will lay before the reader the one on the Grasshopper as a specimen, not caring withal whether he may have seen it twenty times before; for he may have heard many fine airs, and drank many bottles of wine; but that is no reason why he may not choose to hear one of the airs repeated, and take another glass. There is music and wine together in this version of Cowley's It is not entirely free from his conceits, though they are not of such a description as to make us wish them away; and their presence adds to the impression of the writer's sincerity:—

'Happy insect! what can be
In happiness compared to thee?
Fed with nourishment divine,
The dewy morning's gentle wine!

(What a beautiful line is that!)

Nature waits upon thee still,
And thy verdant cup does fill:
'Tis fill'd wherever thou dost tread,
Nature's self's thy Ganymede.
Thou dost drink, and dance, and sing,
Happier than the happiest king.
All the fields which thou dost see,
All the plants belong to thee;
All that summer hours produce,
Fertile made with early juice.
Man for thee does sow and plow,
Farmer he, and landlord thou.
Thou dost innocently joy,
Nor does thy luxury destroy.
The shepherd gladly heareth thee,
More harmonious than he:
Thee country hinds with gladness hear,
Prophet of the ripen'd year.
Thee Phœbus loves and does inspire;
Phœbus is himself thy sire.
To thee, of all things upon earth,
Life is no longer than thy mirth.
Happy insect! happy thou
Dost neither age nor winter know:
But when thou'st drunk, and danc'd, and sung
Thy fill, the flowery leaves among, (Voluptuous, and wise withal, Epicurean animal!)
Sated with thy summer feast,
Thou retir'st to endless rest.'

We are bound to state, that the more closely we have become acquainted with Alfred Tennyson's poems, the more the author has risen upon our admiration. Perhaps we feel ourselves the more inclined to prefer him to Charles, because he seems less disposed to tie himself down to conventional notions,—less willing to blink any great question or feeling, and to put up with a consciousness of doing so. It may itself be a mere conventional mode of talking in Charles, and an assumption of the knowing: but when we see in a sonnet addressed to a friend an announcement of his intention to take orders, and afterwards meet with the following passage, we feel something come over us, which perhaps tends to make us think less of his genius than we ought. The Italics to the word must, and to the third line after it, are of our own putting:—

TO ——.

'Think'st thou, if spirits pure as thine,
Through life might be for ever near,
I should not every fear resign,
As from my boyhood's home I steer?

But 'tis not so—my heart must bleed,
With thorns amid a world of guile,
Snows to my rosy clime succeed,
And Cunning's cant to Virtue's smile.'

Why must it? And what sort of a comment would our young author here furnish to any text he may hereafter preach upon? We trust that this committal of himself vindicates his good intentions: but the style of it is not favourable to that opinion of his natural powers, which we felt ourselves so much inclined to draw from the finer passages we have quoted. If we might be allowed to address our young Poet as friends, (and all poets make us their friends, whether they please to lend an ear to us in return or not) we should say to him, in imitation of his own lines—

- - - - 'Be bold to choose
Truth's never-satiate freedom of delight
Before these narrowed and misgiving views,
And task for joy thy soul's majestic might.'

FORCED WIT NOT WORTH THE EXPENSE.—The Count de Bussi was said to have a great deal of wit: "It costs him too much," said M. de la Chesnaye: "I shall never buy any at the shop where he gets it."

HAPPY COMBINATION.—Mademoiselle de Scudery wrote to the Count de Bussi:—"Your daughter has as much wit as if she saw you every day, and she is as wise as if she had never seen you at all."

REVENGE IN IMAGINATION.—I found the agha of Alacchchetta (a fat coarse old fellow, who was an acquaintance of my conductor) beating a drunken Greek mason with his pipe-stick. The poor artist, who was building him a kiosk, had evidently lost the perpendicular line in a wall; and this had struck the mathematical eye of the Turk simultaneously with the unfortunate toper's own condition. The Greek was excessively hurt at the correction he had received, and wine had made him valiant. "Curse the old rogue!" said he, as the authority went into the house to fetch us chibooks—"Curse him, and curse me if I am not revenged on him!"—"Silence, Palikari, prudence!" said my guide, who feared the poor devil would get into a scrape, by some sudden explosion. "I'll be revenged on him!" continued the mason. "Be quiet, man! what can you do?"—"Do?" said he, thinking awhile, "why, I'll mix the mortar so that it shall not hold two stones together: that's what I'll do, and the wall won't stand a week."—"And then you'll get a good drubbing, and have to build the fallen wall again for nothing."—"Yes," said the mason briskly, "but perhaps the old thief may be under it, when it falls!"—Mac Farlane's Constantinople.

THE PLAY-GOER.

BY THE ORIGINAL THEATRICAL CRITIC IN THE EXAMINER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

COVENT GARDEN.—A Grand Musical Performance.

ADELPHI.

WISHING to vary the reader's Lenten theatricals, we looked in here last night, to witness an entertainment, which, considering the gravity that is understood to predominate on the Wednesdays and Fridays of this season, has rather a startling title; to wit, Morsels of Mirth, for Moments of Merriment. We have no objection to it,—considering the matter with the due philosophy, and in how modest and urbane a style Mr WILLIAMS begs permission to make us laugh. Nor do his visitors appear to have any; for a more good-natured assembly of people we never witnessed than the audience on this occasion. Mr WILLIAMS, it seems, besides being a songster and a teller of stories, has for these eight years been an eminent performer on the card-pack, and a satirist of city wit and grammatical aberrations; all which is the more disinterested in him, inasmuch as his own pronunciation is not always Catholic, nor his style oppressively correct. We entered the house, with a judicious intimation on the part of the check-taker, that the performances were not of the usual description; and found a well-looking gentleman in possession of the stage, which was most elegantly set forth as a furnished apartment, with portraits on the walls; three (as it were) golden tables with lamps, and a variety of mysterious moveables on the same; which we regarded with much the same curiosity as Don Cleofas did the phials in the "Devil upon Two Sticks." From the middle of the stage, over the orchestra, there was a covered way into the pit; and two others led from sides along two or three of the side-boxes; over all which the operator occasionally made incursions among the audience, to request that they would take a card, or lend him their goods and chattels. At one time, he performs some amazing piece of magic with the Knave of Clubs, at which a pleasing though tranquil astonishment pervades the assembly, they perhaps having seen something not altogether unlike it before. Then he sings a song about the Lord Mayor, or tells an elegant story of a pig and an Irishman; and then he returns to his "illusions," and gratifies us by knocking our watches out of a corked bottle, or making a couple of half-crowns dance a pas-deux in a sugar basin. This latter feat was highly applauded, the magician going so far as to borrow a fur-cap from the pit, and putting the sugar-basin upon it, in order to show that there was no collusion between the basin and the table;—a circumstance so manifest as to produce the most cordial rounds of applause. One striking instance of Mr WILLIAMS's taste, and the winning ways these gentlemen have with the fair sex, we must not omit. Some of the spectators have cards dealt out to them; and these, one by one, they are requested to summon out of a card-rack, or some such machine, on the table; upon which the word of command is given, and the intelligent pieces of paper behave themselves accordingly. One gentleman, however, in vain ordered his card to "rise." The order was repeatedly disobeyed. The house knew not what to think. Every body would have felt in pain for Mr WILLIAMS, but for the tranquil way in which he bore himself, and the unmoved, we might almost say the heroical, expression of his countenance. At length he requested to know what card it was the gentleman had drawn.

"The Queen of Hearts."

"The Queen of Hearts!" exclaims Mr WILLIAMS, smiling:—"That indeed explains the mystery, for it is a lady who is called upon to rise, and it is fitting the request should be made in the politest manner."

(Here there is a pretty flutter of approbation among all the ladies; and several gallant voices applaud.)

"Could you not favour us, Sir," resumes Mr WILLIAMS, "with one of those graceful speeches with which you address other ladies, when you would persuade them to rise?"

The Queen is at length requested in a proper manner to favour the house with her appearance, and she rises in all the majesty of the picture-card.

Two of Mr WILLIAMS's songs are very effective,—one on the Lord's Mayor's Feast that was to have been, and another entitled 'The Nervous Family," which is written with a considerable feeling of the ludicrous, and well set to the tune of "We're all nodding." Much of the entertainment, one would think, might be easily improved to his advantage, by having recourse to some popular writer: but if all his audiences resemble those of last night, he may be content with the number of his visitors, if not always with the amount of their applause. His manner is somewhat hard, and he now and then trips in his sentences: but we are not called upon to be very critical; for Mr WILLIAMS modesty disclaims all idea of competition with the "Lion of Laughter MATHEWS," and the "inimitable YATES."

We never see an exhibitor of this sort, but he does us one great good: he reminds us of Swift's exquisite banter upon the impossibilities which geniuses of his class are sometimes led to announce, by the vivacity of their public knowledge. One of the feats of his Wonderful Performer consisted in letting any gentleman have his eye thrust half way out of its socket, during which operation he was to see an "unspeakable number of beautiful colours."

Another, was to prepare a board full of spikes at the bottom of a wall, and to let any gentleman leap down upon it, first having taken off his shoes. And he was to alight as upon a feather-bed.

Item, he lets any lady give him her little child, and cunningly tosses it upon a set of javelins prepared on purpose, where it sticks for some time, "to the satisfaction of the beholders." After which it is taken down, without so much as a hole in its coat.

With many others, which we cannot call to mind, without doing injustice to the style. One of them is to let any gentleman take a basin of scalding water, and toss it right in the face of his favourite lady.

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

"The little and short sayings of wise and excellent men are of great value, like the dust of gold, or the least sparks of diamonds."—Tillotson.

A COMPLIMENT OFF-HAND.—One day, says Menage, I held with both of mine one of the hands of Madame de Sevigné. When she withdrew it, Pelletier said to me, "That is the finest work which has ever gone out of your hands."

REVENGE OF A NEGLECTED AUTHOR.—The Abbé de Morelles not only translated the poems of others, but also made verses himself; and in speaking of the injustice of the age, he said, that in spite of the public, he had published one hundred and thirty-three thousand one hundred and twenty-four verses.

THE RIVAL VILLAGES.—Mr MacFarlane, in his 'Constantinople,' gives a curious picture of the absurdity into which the want of occupation, and the want of ideas, may drive people, for the sake of some sort of excitement. He tells us that in the neighbourhood of Smyrna are two villages called Bournabat and Boodjà. One or other of these villages is patronised by the inhabitants of Smyrna, who are absolutely divided into two parties, each vehemently insisting upon the pre-eminence of the favourite village; they not only keep up a continual discussion upon the subject among themselves, but are at great pains to persuade the traveller of the exclusive advantages of the one village, and objections to the other. The author gives a little dialogue between two ladies of the rival parties, which sufficiently proves the lamentable condition of the fair adversaries: "Why, you have no water at Boodjà, six months in the year," says the lady of Bournabat. "If we have occasionally a scarcity of water, we have, at the same time, neither musquitoes nor Turks to annoy us," retorts the lady of Boodjà. "You cannot walk out in the day-time; you have no shade," says the lady of Bournabat. "But we can walk out in the evening without lanterns, which is what you cannot do at Bournabat," replies the lady of Boodjà. "We have more bon ton, more finery," says the lady of Bournabat. "We have more merry parties, and more freedom," says the rival lady. "But we have five consuls at Bournabat!"—adds the one with emphasis. "We care so little about consuls," once retorted a wicked advocate on the other side, "that we let our pigs eat them." This refers to an accident which befel a gentleman of consular dignity at Boodjà, who, when feeding a sow and a litter of pigs, had a large piece bitten out of his leg, by the ungrateful matron. Upon the whole, an English reader would probably be inclined to favour the village of Boodjà, only making an exception against the breeding—perhaps it would be more proper to say the morals— of its pigs.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

FRIDAY, MARCH 4, 1831.

TO ADVERTISERS.

On Monday next, The Tatler will begin to admit Advertisements, but under such an arrangement of its letter-press as will take nothing from the reader.

This opportunity may be particularly worthy the attention of those who deal in commodities conducive in any way to the Graces of Life, whether intellectual or external, such as Books, Music, Paintings, Engravings, Sculpture, Apparel, Jewellery, or any kind of Fancy Article; in short, anything connected with habits of elegance and refinement.

The space of The Tatler devoted to this purpose will be of necessity a great deal smaller than in other Daily Papers, so that every Advertisement will be sure of being seen; and Advertisers will bear in mind, that as the readers of the paper consist of Play-goers, Men of Leisure, Actors and Actresses, Accomplished Women in general, the Lovers of Books, Music, &c., and other cultivators of social intercourse and amusement, they form the very description of persons who are the most likely to repay the use made of its columns.

Advertisements received at the Tatler Office, 4 Catherine street, Strand; also by Mr G. Reynell, Country Newspaper and General Advertising Office, 42 Chancery lane; and by Messrs C. and W. Reynell, at the Printing Office, 45 Broad street, Golden square.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

Gorton's Topographical Dictionary.—A Topographical Dictionary of Great Britain and Ireland, compiled from Local Information, and the most recent Official Authorities. By John Gorton, Editor of the General Biographical Dictionary. The Irish and Welsh Articles by J. H. Wright, M. A. Professor of Antiquities, &c. &c. With fifty-two Quarto Maps, Drawn and Engraved by Sidney Hall. In Three Volumes. Vol. I, pp. 739. Chapman and Hall.

This is a great improvement upon the publications known by the name of Gazetteers. It has several novel points of utility for reference; its type is both solid and clear; its maps remarkably entitled to the same eulogy; and the spirit of its information on a par with that of the times. In short, it has not dishonored the name of its Editor; and may, and we have no doubt will, stand by the side of his excellent "Biographical Dictionary," as a standard book of reference, uniting the convenience of smaller works of the sort, with the carefulness, and (for all general purposes) the comprehensiveness of larger.

It is but justice to the Editor to quote a few passages from his preface, in order to show the industry and good conscience with which he has executed his compilation, and to give the reader a proper idea of the exclusive advantages that are to be found in this New Topographical Dictionary.

'The Editor,' says the Preface, 'may be allowed to observe, that he has sought to condense as much general information as possible, in the smallest compass in which it could be clearly conveyed; to obtain access to the best information in his power, including a direct correspondence with places of importance; and finally, to form a convenient manual for the parlour book-case appertaining to every rank in life; to be always at hand for immediate reference, and not unfrequently of sufficient authority to supersede the necessity of application to more voluminous sources of information

'In the accomplishment of this task, some errors will inadvertently occur, whatever system be adopted, or attention bestowed. The sources of misconception are at the same time not very numerous, but instances occur in which no exertion or industry will suffice to produce a total exclusion of ambiguity. This chiefly relates to places of which the population-returns make no mention, because the number of inhabitants is not specifically stated, but included in that of the parish or other larger division, with which it may be directly or arbitrarily connected; neither is there any authority or authorities that can be altogether depended upon in this respect. A separate alphabet of these places, stating name, parish, hundred, and county, will form, however, a portion of the Appendix, which will also rectify and explain all the discovered omissions and inaccuracies which have been committed in the course of the undertaking.'—P. 8.

With regard to the peculiar features of the work, the Preface tells us "that there is none, either upon a small or a large scale, which, with equal particularity and comprehensiveness, has thrown the whole of Great Britain, Ireland, and their insular dependencies, under one general alphabet, in such a manner as to forfeit not a single benefit derivable from their separation. Even if it be admitted, that the locality of a place, so far as relates to its situation in England, Scotland, and Ireland, be seldom unknown, the liability of referring to the wrong alphabet is of continual recurrence, to the occasional consumption both of time and temper; while, where uncertainty may exist as to the portion of the United Kingdom, in which the place sought for is situated, the advantage is obvious and unequivocal.' * * * 'A second peculiarity of arrangement, upon which a new Topographical Dictionary may advance some claim to novelty and ability, consists in the selection of such particulars to form a heading to each article, as may frequently form the sole object of occasional reference; such as distance, post-town, markets, fairs, population,' &c. * * * Another point is 'the attention paid to exactitude in the topographical locality of each place, as distinguished from the general one. Many points of business may be determined and governed by trustworthy accuracy, in this respect, especially in the office of the lawyer; and not unfrequently in that of the merchant or trader; seeing that especial customs sometimes belong to particular districts, as respects tolls and other matters, by which their transactions may be materially guided. The population and other Parliamentary returns which have become so abundant of late years, supply many additional facilities in this direction, of which it has been endeavoured to make a proper use.'

Speaking of the ecclesiastical divisions of the country, especially as regards parish livings and their patronage, the Editor says, 'To a certain degree, the clergy claim the same privilege of being silent as to their extent of property as other people; and while this reasoning is deemed correct by the Government and Legislature, little more can be done than to repeat the old nominal valuations, except, when Parliamentary aid having become necessary, it could only be obtained by a disclosure of the paucity of remuneration, which had led to the appeal.'

Mr Gorton lays great stress on the assistance he has received in the topography of Wales. Of poor Ireland, destined to be unhappy in all her particulars, it is said that so much laxity and inaccuracy has prevailed in relation to the minor branches of her topography, 'that all approximation to correctness must be accounted as so much gained from mist and obscurity.'

As a good specimen of the work, we will select an account of a town not uninteresting in itself, but made a prominent object at present by a circumstance now taking place, which has brought its Parliamentary character forward in all the lustre of rottenness. Among the boroughs proposed by Lord John Russell to be disfranchised, is the renowned one (capitally named) of

'BOROUGHBRIDGE, West Riding, County of York.
'London, 206 m. NNW. York, 17 m. NW.
'Ripon, 6 m. SE. Population, 860. Market day, Saturday.
'Fairs, April 27 and 28, for horned cattle and sheep; June 22 and 23, ditto, with horses and hard-ware; and October 23, horned cattle and sheep. Members of Parliament, 2.

'A borough, market-town, and township in the parish of Aldborough, in the wapentake of Clare, situate on the south bank of the river Ure, over which there is a stone bridge. The houses are well built, and the town possesses many good inns; its consequence having originated in its position as a thoroughfare on the great north road, from which, and from its manufacture of hard-ware, the principal business of the inhabitants is still derived. It early obtained a market, and in 1577 was constituted a borough, with the privilege of sending two members to Parliament. The right of election is in the burgage-holders, who are nominally between seventy and eighty; but the appointment of the two members is actually enjoyed by the Duke of Newcastle; returning officer, the bailiff of that nobleman, who also governs the town. Boroughbridge is a chapelry to the parish of Aldborough; living, a curacy, in the archdeaconry of Richmond, and diocese of Chester; annexed to the vicarage of the northern church. About half a mile south of the town are three stupendous obelisks, called the Arrows, respectively, eighteen, twenty-two and a half, and twenty-two feet high, and each computed to weigh from thirty to thirty-six tons. They are formed of coarse rag-stones, and a great diversity of opinions exist among the antiquaries as to the purpose for which they were erected, and by whom. The major part of these authorities, however, assign them to the Romans; and deem them the metas, or stones round which the chariots were turned in the chariot races. In the year 1321 a sanguinary battle was fought near this place, between the forces of Edward II and the insurrectionary barons, headed by the Earl of Leicester, in which the latter were defeated, and the Earl and several more noblemen taken prisoners, and executed. Here are annual races.'—P. 251.

We add an account of a little town in Westmoreland, now become interesting upon a very different score:—

'BROUGHAM, or BURGHAM, co. Westmoreland.
P. T. Penrith (283) 2 m. SE. Pop. 143.

'A parish and township in West ward; living, a rectory in the arch-deaconry and diocese of Carlisle; valued in K. B. 16*l.* 10*s.* 7½*d.*; church ded. to St Wilfred; patron (1829) the Earl of Thanet. Brougham Castle, a majestic and venerable pile, is situated on a woody eminence, at the confluence of the Eamont and Lowther rivers, a mile from Penrith, on the site of the Norman station Brouvoniacum. It is of Roman architecture, and was built by the Veteriponts and Cliffords, and last repaired by the celebrated Anne (Clifford) Dowager Countess of Pembroke in 1651: since which it has been not only left to decay, but a part of the materials have been appropriated to the erection of farm-houses. Near this castle is the lofty pillar, with a lengthy inscription, recording the parting of the above spirited Peeress, with her mother, the Countess of Cumberland; in memory whereof she left 4*l.* per annum to the poor of Brougham for ever, to be distributed every second day of April, "on the stone hereby."'

Speaking of Brougham Hall, the seat of "the eminent writer, lawyer, and orator," who now presides in the House of Lords, the article adds,—

'It was at a very early period the property of the family of Brougham, but was divided and carried away into different families by the marriages of co-heiresses, until ultimately re-united in one individual, whose daughter sold it to John Brougham, Esq. a descendant of the original family, by which curious combination of circumstances, the estate has been restored, not only to the posterity, but to the name of its ancient possessors.'—P. 306.

Our only objection to the New Topographical Dictionary, (and this may be peculiar to ourselves, and might have demanded a total alteration of the plan to remove it), is that the little interesting circumstances scattered here and there, connected with literature and antiquities, tempt us to wish that there were more of them. But we are insatiate in these matters. Under the head of Bethnal Green, for instance, we are told that "the well known ballad of the 'Blind Beggar of Bethnal Green' was written in the reign of Elizabeth, and founded on a legend, recording the supposed adventures of Henry de Montford, son of the famous Earl of Leicester, who lost his life at the Battle of Evesham, in the reign of Henry the Third. This story is a great favourite with the inhabitants; and the blind beggar not only forms a well known sign, but is painted upon the staff of the parish beadles."—Now here we would at least have had a taste of the ballad, if not the whole of it.

So at 'Cumnor,' in Berkshire, the scene of the catastrophe in Sir Walter Scott's novel of 'Kenilworth,' we would have had the pretty picturesque commencement of Mickle's ballad. We forget the first line, but we remember the landscape so beautifully touched in the remainder:—

'The moon, sweet regent of the sky,
Silver'd the walls of Cumnor hall,
And many an oak that grew thereby.'

At Alloway in Ayrshire, we would have had a piece of Tam o' Shanter, a production which the Editor has not forgotten. At Ailsa, we desiderated the fine sonnet of Mr Keats, addressed to Ailsa Rock, beginning

'Hearken, thou craggy ocean pyramid:'

and at Banbury, the cakes and religion of which are duly recorded, we would have found Drunken Barnaby's memento:—

'To Banbury came I (O profane one!)
Where I saw a Puritane one,
Hanging of his cat on Monday,
For killing of a mouse on Sunday.'

Nay, at Ballyspellin, 'the Spa (says the work) so celebrated in the verses of Dr Sheridan and Dean Swift,' we would have taken at least the Doctor's closing stanza:—

'My rhymes are gone; I think I've none,
Unless I should bring hell in;
But since I'm here, to heav'n so near,
I can't at Ballyspellin.'

At Dorchester is a pleasant anecdote of Arbuthnot:—'Dr Arbuthnot, the friend of Swift and Pope, settled here as a physician in the early part of his life; but meeting with little practice, he determined to leave the town, because, as he jocosely declared, "a man could neither live nor die in it."'

Having alluded in the course of our article, to a remarkable public event now in progress, we cannot but seize the earliest opportunity of congratulating upon it all the lovers of Reform. Great good must come of it, however it may terminate in the immediate spot where it originates. We are greatly surprised at its originators: we enjoy exceedingly the dismay of its opponents: and though we cannot suppose that its authors can contemplate the whole of its consequences (which, if they did, would exalt them still higher in our opinion), yet we feel perfectly certain, that if anything could save the Tories themselves from losing their share of aristocratical ascendancy, it would be a measure resembling this very one. Far should we be from entertaining so favourable an opinion of it, if such were likely to be the case: but of all their forlorn hopes (if they really understood on what to found them)—this, we are persuaded, would be the only one, which could give them even the semblance of such a chance. Their expectation of making anything like a stand, was, and is ridiculous; and, we now trust, will not prove something worse: but they were right in thinking that one concession would produce more. It will produce, we believe, just as many concessions as it ought; and among others will be that of the Ballot,—an institution, which, in any Parliament pretending to go upon grounds of reason, or not flagrantly daring to sophisticate, might be irresistibly brought forward upon the ground of their own use of it. They find it necessary for their own interior purposes. With what face could they deny it to the people?

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

"The little and short sayings of wise and excellent men are of great value, like the dust of gold, or the least sparks of diamonds."—Tillotson.

NOBILITY.—For democracies, they need it not [nobility]; and they are commonly more quiet and less subject to sedition, than where there are strips of nobles; for men's eyes are upon the business, and not upon the persons; or if upon the persons, it is for the business' sake, as fittest, and not for flags and pedigree. We see the Switzers last well, notwithstanding their diversity of religion and of cantons; for UTILITY is their bond, and not respects. Bacon.

NAPOLEON'S LEARNING ENGLISH.—During dinner, the Emperor described to us the contents of some French (query English) papers, which he had by him, and which he said, gave an account of the shipwreck of La Perouse, his different adventures, his death, and his journal, &c. The narrative consisted of most curious, striking, and romantic details, and interested us exceedingly. The Emperor observed how highly our curiosity was excited, and then burst into a fit of laughter. This story was nothing but an impromptu of his own, which he said he had invented merely to show us the progress he had made in English.—Las Casas' Journal.

DR POCOCK, THE TRAVELLER.—That celebrated oriental traveller and author was a man of mild manners and primitive simplicity. Having given the world a full detail of his researches in Egypt, he seemed to hold himself excused from saying anything more about them, and observed in general an obdurate taciturnity. In his carriage and deportment he appeared to have contracted something of the Arab character, yet there was no austerity in his silence, and though his air was solemn, his temper was serene. When we were on our road to Ireland, I saw from the windows of the inn at Daventry, a cavalcade of horsemen approaching on a gentle trot, headed by an elderly chief in clerical attire, who was followed by five servants at distances geometrically measured and most precisely maintained, and who upon entering the inn proved to be this distinguished prelate, conducting his horde with the phlegmatic patience of a Schiek.—Cumberland's Memoirs.

MR BENTHAM.—As contemporaries seem designed to keep pace with one another in intellect, no less than in manners, every one who rushes on far beyond the ranks, or exhibits any very strong desire to do so, is naturally viewed from that moment with suspicion, at least, if not with envy and aversion. His constitutional vigour and alacrity receive the name of affectation, and instead of being considered a great man, he is sometimes regarded as a mountebank. This has happened in our own age. When Mr Bentham published his Defence of Usury, almost fifty years ago, he was treated as a visionary, and his notions were despised. Time went on, and in the course of thirty or forty years, some few came up with Mr Bentham's position, and found it no longer so absurd as it had appeared through the mists of distance. Meanwhile, the philosopher was stretching away before them, inventing and discovering, and still appearing in his new positions as ludicrous as in the matter of usury. When they overtake him again, they may again find him rational; and, meantime, he can wait.—St John's Anatomy of Society.

QUEEN'S THEATRE.

AFTER so many disappointments in minor pieces, we are glad to have found one a little more in the usual sprightly fashion. We began to think the vintage of light wines was failing. The new musical entertainment produced here last night, entitled "Mrs G.," is a translation, we understand, by Mr BARNETT, from a French piece called Madame Gregoire. The English title announces a scene in England; but the locality of the original is retained at some expense to consistency, for the sake of the piquant initial; and we are not disposed to quarrel with the arrangement, considering the little veracities that are so often of necessity sacrificed to the production of stage effect.

The plot turns upon the ancient story of a woman's inviting several of her lovers to an assignation, at the same spot and at the same hour, and exposing them. Madame Gregoire, alias Mrs G. (Mrs GLOVER), is the jolly middle-aged landlady of the Golden Pippin, who has an establishment handsome enough to make people fall in love with her, and a face equally sufficient to warrant their laying the passion to a different account. Monsieur Timide Tendre (Mr SMITH) attacks her (if he can be said to attack); Monsieur Alexis Chassée (Mr FORESTER) attacks her with his two legs, being a dancing-master; Monsieur Perigorge (Mr MUNROE) attacks her, with his middle-aged wig and gruffness; and Monsieur Achilles Belle-rose, Serjeant of the Garde de Corps (Mr J. RUSSELL) attacks her with his military renown, and his name uniting heroism and sweetness. Mrs G. is secretly inclined to the Serjeant, who suspects it, and who being willing to marry the jolly hostess, secretly invites himself, without asking, to her apartment. To this same apartment comes, in a short time, M. Timide Tendre, with a bottle of wine in each hand, a patch over his left eye, and a wooden leg under his left knee,—the disguise under which Madame has invited him to come and see her, with the understanding that he is to personate a husband of her's, who she says is coming home from the wars in that state. The Serjeant begins drinking the wine of M. Timide, and contrives to huff him out of the house; after which he goes behind a curtained bed, and being overcome with his drink, lies down and sleeps. There enters then another phenomenon, in the like condition with Tendre; to wit, M. Perigorge, who has scarcely announced himself to the servant, as the expected husband, when a third arrives, in the person of M. Chassée. These two patch-eyed and wooden-legged gentlemen take one another for the real man, and are cursing their stars, and wondering at each other's forbearance, when the fair object of their passion comes in; and pretending, as she stands behind them, to recognise her long absent spouse, entreats him—(they do not know which)—to come to her arms. Finding her call not responded to, she has a violent fit. The humanity of one of them induces him to turn about, and approach her. "Go (she groans aside) into the room on the left." He vanishes. The other approaches. "Go (she says to him) into the room on the right." Away skips M. Chassée. The wives of these two gentlemen, also by appointment, then come in: the candles are put out; the husbands are called back, and have their wives' hands put into theirs with encouraging words, whispered by the fair deceiver, as if in her own person, she all the while protesting that they are doing their own handsome wives injustice. They grasp the blessing, praising the kind giver, and saying that their wives are nothing to her. The candles then are suddenly brought in, neighbours and soldiers pour in likewise (brought by the resentful Monsieur Timide), and the ladies are made triumphant.

A perplexity however suddenly arises. The somewhat too rejoicing virtue of Madame Gregoire is threatened with the resentment of the Gods. A snore, to the consternation of all present, is heard from the bed! The curtains are drawn, and the gallant Serjeant is found stretched on the hitherto unsullied down of Madame Gregoire. Madame bursts into tears, and says she "should not have thought it of the Serjeant." What is to be done? The gallant soldier seizes the opportunity for a coup de main, and whispers her, that no hope remains for her reputation, unless she declares herself married. She does so, and the Golden Pippin is won.

Mrs GLOVER plays her part remarkably well; looks it to the life; and laughs, and goes into fits, with a relish equally suitable to the gaiety of her embonpoint. The way in which she reads a simpleton's letter in verse, and hinders its real dullness from palling upon the audience, by mixing it up with her laughter as she proceeds, is admirable; and completely did what it intended. Mr FORRESTER, as M. Chassée, was very good in the legs. His countenance, when they had nothing to do, was not quite so effective. Mr J. RUSSELL, we should think, by his name (Achilles Belle-rose) hardly puts sufficient sweetness into his strength. But a song which he sings to the Tyrolese air, at present so popular about the streets (in Hofer, we believe), has a very ludicrous effect. That up and down, gargling sort of passage, which forms the burden of the original, is made to fall on the initial, in the words "Mrs G.;" and being somewhat fantastic and mystical in itself, is pleasantly mocked by being rolled about on the single letter.

The theatre deserves great praise for the way in which the piece is got up. The costume of the reign of Louis XV is preserved to a nicety; and the new and selected music by Mr HARROWAY is not unworthy of its French character. Among the airs, is the pretty and striking one of Prenez garde. ☞

MISTAKING ONE'S TALENT.—Racine had a great desire to be thought a courtier, but he did not know the way. The king seeing him one day walking with M. de Cavoye, said, there are two men whom I often see walking together, and I guess the reason. Cavoye with Racine fancies himself a wit, Racine with Cavoye fancies himself a courtier.

"GREAT WITS TO MADNESS SURE ARE NEAR ALLIED."—One of the oddities of Mezerai, the historian, was that of writing always by candle-light, even in the middle of the day in the height of summer; and as if he was fully persuaded that the world had no sun to light it, he never failed to see his visitors to the street-door, bearing a candle in his hand.

THE GENERAL OUT-GENERALLED.—General W—— was in the habit of recounting the following circumstance with great glee, as having happened to himself whilst in Canada. Having, one winter's day, gone a little distance to dine with a friend, and there meeting with a party of merry fellows, the General, who was no enemy to his bottle, made it rather late before he returned to his quarters, and had moreover either forgotten, or not provided himself with the pass-word for the night. But as even this did not occur to him until challenged by the sentinel, he demanded a parley, and stating who he was, found no difficulty whatever in prevailing on the latter (a raw Irish recruit, and who was, besides, well acquainted with the general's person) to let him pass. So far all went well. But the General had, like many other men, a little bit of a foible, which was, when he had taken a glass, to fancy himself a rather smart officer; and wished to impress the same notion on the poor sentinel. No sooner, therefore, had he received permission to enter the wicket, than he turned on the soldier in a violent rage, and demanded how the d—d rascal dare let any one pass without the parole, &c. adding at the same time, that as sure as he was alive, he would have him tried and flogged next morning. In vain did the poor Irishman beg his Honour's pardon, and humbly urge that he could not keep his "Gin'ral shivering in the could sich a bitter night, and he knowing him all the while:" but nothing could pacify the gallant officer; punished he must be. The soldier finding all his arguments lost on the determined martinet, stopt short all at once, and thus accosted him, "And ye'll flog me, Gin'ral, for not keeping ye here to perish in the could? ye'll flog me?"—"That will I," said the General, so sure as my name is W——." "Och, but you wont thin," said the soldier (bringing his musket to the charge, with his bayonet at the officer's breast) "bide ye there, Gin'ral; by Jasus, ye're not gone yet;" and very deliberately marched the General into the sentry box, where, in spite of all his protestations, that he only meant to frighten a young recruit, and that, so far from harming, he would reward him, &c. the inexorable fellow kept him, for two of the longest and coldest hours he had spent in his life, till finally relieved by the rounds.—From a Correspondent.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

SATURDAY, MARCH 5, 1831.

TO ADVERTISERS.

On Monday next, The Tatler will begin to admit Advertisements, but under such an arrangement of its letter-press as will take nothing from the reader.

This opportunity may be particularly worthy the attention of those who deal in commodities conducive in any way to the Graces of Life, whether intellectual or external, such as Books, Music, Paintings, Engravings, Sculpture, Apparel, Jewellery, or any kind of Fancy Article; in short, anything connected with habits of elegance and refinement.

The space of The Tatler devoted to this purpose will be of necessity a great deal smaller than in other Daily Papers, so that every Advertisement will be sure of being seen; and Advertisers will bear in mind, that as the readers of the paper consist of Play-goers, Men of Leisure, Actors and Actresses, Accomplished Women in general, the Lovers of Books, Music, &c., and other cultivators of social intercourse and amusement, they form the very description of persons who are the most likely to repay the use made of its columns.

Advertisements received at the Tatler Office, 4 Catherine street, Strand; also by Mr G. Reynell, Country Newspaper and General Advertising Office, 42 Chancery lane; and by Messrs C. and W. Reynell, at the Printing Office, 45 Broad street, Golden square.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

An Essay on the State of the Country, in Respect to the Condition and Conduct of the Husbandry Labourers, and to the Consequences likely to result therefrom. Pp. 16. [Not for sale.]

This pamphlet we take to be from the same hand that wrote the "Letter to a Minister of State respecting Taxes on Knowledge." It is full of startling matter; and like everything now said, written, and done, makes us glad that a certain great question has been brought forward in a manner indicative of a right progress. We again have to differ with the author respecting the extent of ignorance which he attributes to the rick-burners: indeed we think he differs with himself, when he admits that the rick-burning has obtained its end, and that the hopelessness of all attempts to reduce wages has forced the consideration of the state of the country into the only channels of argument that can do it good. How is this state to be generally and briefly described? Unquestionably thus:—There is a church and an aristocracy, that have enormously too much: there is a middle class, part of which have much more than enough; part, the proper work and the proper leisure; and all, enough to subsist upon somehow or other:—finally, there is the poor class, who are forced to work over much, and to eat (for the most part) too little; and the intelligence of these has increased with their misery. The Tories,—fat fools!—their blood whirling with the confidence of their beef and port, are for driving matters to extremities, and having a fight. They would fain have their palaces burnt about their ears, as the ricks were,—

"All to adorn sweet Castle Hyde!"

After which, like the idiot in Johnson, they would "go and lie all night on the bridge." The Whigs, made doubly sensible of the value of their theories of liberty by the frenzy of the Tories, and not the less incited to carry them into practice in order to render hopeless the return of the others to office (and it was a masterly and gallant measure), have declared for the people, in the hope of tranquilly settling the question, and saving their coronets. Well: we believe it now may be tranquilly settled, let the Tories rage as they please, or even succeed in some immediate effort. It is sufficient that the whole aristocracy, all over wealthy and over idle, have not agreed to exasperate the whole democracy, all sharpened in intellect, and a great many starving. A reformed Parliament will meet, and Tithes will go directly. That will be the first concession,—the first step towards giving back to the poor some of the "crumbs that fall from the rich man's table." A thousand footmen will be in a state of consternation; and tens of thousands of hard-working labourers will look up, and see "the day of their redemption drawing nigh." Rent would have gone before, if the Whigs had not saved the Tories. What is to be done next, we shall not guess; but at all events, the too little must be made greater, and the too much must disburse (thank God! they need not "bleed"). To the just appreciation, and therefore to the tranquillity, of this inevitable consummation the author of the pamphlet before us would fain contribute; and to this end he writes, among many other things worth reading, as follows:—

'Since workmen, by the repeal of the laws which forbade them to combine either to raise their wages, or to regulate the hours of working, have been repealed, they have generally abstained from doing mischief to the machines or other property of their employers; very little mischief in this way has been done since the final repeal of these laws in 1826, and that little was done only by the most ignorant of them. No doubt need be entertained that, when somewhat better informed, as workmen cannot fail to be, all such unjustifiable proceedings will wholly cease.*

'Vast numbers of working people are convinced that destruction of machines and other property must diminish, and cannot increase, the quantity of employment, and this conviction will become general.

'Labourers in husbandry have not been able to associate as workmen have done, and thus they have been debarred the opportunities which workmen have had to instruct one another. Workmen have been free agents in comparison with husbandry labourers, who have had no will of their own. They have been interfered with in every possible way; they have been controlled and regulated in a manner which tended to increase their number disproportionately to employment, depressed them lower and lower, and kept them in a state of ignorance, which deprived them even of the hope of bettering their condition; it prevented their understanding their relative situation, as they might have been taught to understand it; and at length drove them to commit enormities, by which they expected to draw attention to their condition; they resorted to intimidation in the only way which, to them, seemed likely, even for a moment, to be effectual; they knew that any attempt to intimidate, by merely showing themselves in numbers, would be useless; the time had long gone by, when such proceedings could have been of any use to them; and some, more desperate than others, set an example to all, which all could understand, and all were likely to follow, or to countenance; they set fire to stacks and barns; and yet when they commenced this course of proceeding, it was more from despair than hope, and, probably (it may, indeed, almost be said certainly), without contemplating the increase of wages to which it led. The mischievous and lamentable example was followed; the intimidation it produced was at once apparent; advantage was taken of it, and increase of wages was demanded and obtained. Farmers have been compelled to sign agreements, and promise to give wages which they cannot afford to pay. The labourers acknowledge this, but say they cannot afford to starve any longer, and starve they will not.

'This, then, is the state of the case: wages are demanded and paid, which, if they come from profit, must ruin the farmers. Farmers must have a reasonable profit, or they must cease to carry on their business; the cannot have a reasonable profit, or any profit at all, if, besides paying the wages demanded, they pay Tithes, Rent, Taxes, and Rates.

'Will intimidation cease? Will labourers desist from demanding wages which farmers cannot afford to pay? The answers are—No, they will not desist; intimidation will not cease. There may be, and most likely there will be, intervals of peace, or rather cessations of hostilities; but attempts to reduce wages, will again produce the burning of farm produce.

'Much has been said of the efficacy of talking and writing to the husbandry labourers; but these at present would be utterly useless, as to any immediate effects to be produced on them. They should long since have been taught, it is too late to expect immediate good consequences from talking to men circumstanced as they are; their

* A very short time ago, in conversation with some workmen who were complaining of the machinery used in their trade, they were asked—"Why do you not, like the husbandry labourers, break and burn the machinery?" The reply was—"NO, we will commit no violence: besides, some of the masters would be very much obliged to us for destroying their machines: many of them are almost out of date, in consequence of recent improvements: they would make the county pay as much money for their old machines as would enable them to replace them with the newest and most improved. No, no! we know better than that."

object is an increase of wages, and this, to them, has become past, present, and future; they carry their reasoning no further. Talk to one of these men with the half-crown in his fist, which he has received for his day's labour; tell him of the mischief of burning stacks, and extorting wages he knows the farmer cannot afford to pay, and the chances are ten to one, that he will show the consequence of his conduct, by exhibiting the money, and reply to your arguments by laughing in your face.

'To expect a permanent cessation of stack-burning, and a fall of the labourer's wages, which stack-burning has extorted, is unreasonable; and he who does expect it will probably be disappointed.

'What, then, may a reasonable man calculate upon as the result? Let us enquire.

'1. Labourers obtain from farmers wages which they cannot afford to pay, if they are also to pay Tithes, Rent, Taxes, and Rates.

'2. If farmers pay these wages, and pay them they must, they cannot long continue either to pay Tithes or *Rent in full, if, indeed they can pay much or anything towards either; the deficiency must therefore fall on the parsons and landlords. The immediate terror from withholding tithes and rent, will be less than that which compels them to pay the increased wages and rates; add to which, that they will calculate on the protection of the labourers, to whom they pay good wages, against both parsons and landlords.

'3. But if tithes and rents are not paid, or paid only in part, the incomes of parsons and landlords will either be wholly or partly destroyed, and they will be compelled to discharge servants, to purchase fewer articles from tradesmen, and to consume fewer manufactured goods.

'4. The business of tradesmen and manufacturers must therefore fall off! and they, too, will discharge servants and working people: many of these must come upon the parish, for it will be impossible for them to procure employment, and the poor-rate will increase as the ability to pay it decreases.†

'5. Thus poverty and misery will increase amongst servants and workpeople, the profits of their employers will fall, embarrassment will come on, and when this has proceeded to a certain length, the trading and manufacturing portion of the people will refuse to pay taxes.

'6. Whenever any considerable portion of the people shall refuse to pay taxes, the example will be immediately followed, Government will be left without revenue, and be unable to maintain itself any longer.

'7. If, then, husbandry labourers cannot be put back again to the pauper allowance, nor the number of the people be diminished to that for which profitable employment can be found, a Revolution is inevitable.

'Some of these statements may require elucidation.

'The first and second need no comment; they will it is concluded, be admitted.

'The labourers have, in many places, learned them so well, that they have told the farmers not again to pay tithes in money, but to set them out, and leave the rest to them; and they have cautioned farmers not to pay rent beyond their means, and to rely on them for protection. It is fully admitted by intelligent persons, residing in the counties where burnings have been most frequent, that very many farmers and others, if they do not make common cause with the labourers, tolerate their proceedings, and look forward to the time when their assistance will be expected, to protect them from the consequences of omitting to pay tithes and rent.

'To the matter contained in the remaining statements, many objections have been made: they may all, however, be resolved into this: That inasmuch as the husbandry labourers will, in consequence of increased wages, be enabled to purchase the goods which the parsons and landlords used to purchase, trade will not decline, as has been predicted; and if trade does not decline, the consequences mentioned will not follow. This statement contains a fallacy. The labourers and their families will no longer be only half-fed, whilst in employment. On the contrary, they and their families will be well fed; their number is very large, and the quantity of food they will consume must be very great; it will be an immense quantity, in addition to that which they have been accustomed to consume, and the increase of wages will be nearly all expended in food. They will no doubt purchase more articles of coarse clothing; but this, when compared with the quantity the parsons and landlords used, including, as ought to be done, their families, servants, and dependents of all sorts, will be but a small quantity; and the same may be said of traders and manufacturers, their servants and work-people, who will be discharged, and reduced to abject poverty.

'All the farm produce, and all the commodities which can go to wages, without destroying profits and putting an end to business, is a certain proportionable quantity. This quantity is by no means sufficient, plentifully to feed all the people who are employed, and are able and willing to work. All that is produced at home, and some which is procured from abroad, is consumed; and yet hundreds of thousands of persons have not enough.

'The whole quantity of everything eatable, which has been consumed by the labourers and working-people, has been unequally divided—

'1. Amongst many who have had enough.

'2. Amongst a larger number who have not had enough.

'3. Amongst many more who have not had nearly enough.

'4. Amongst many who have been more than half-starved.

'5. Amongst many who have had such small quantities that they have died, either of starvation, or of the diseases which bad food, in small quantities, have either produced or rendered fatal.

'From this statement, which will be denied by no observing man, it is plain that if an equal distribution were made, none would have enough.

'Husbandry labourers and their families, generally, have not had enough even whilst employed, if all of them were now to have enough; and if they, too, for whom no employment can be found are to have, as is demanded, an increased allowance, the whole of the difference of the additional quantity they will consume must be taken from others, and misery will spread all over the country. A different distribution, it must be remembered, is not an increase in the quantity to be distributed;* it can only be taken from one description of persons, from a vast number who cannot afford to have their usual quantity diminished, to be given to another description of persons, who doubtless very much need it.

'As the increase of wages received by the husbandry labourers will be expended almost wholly in food, and as the parsons, landlords, tradesmen, and others, will be compelled to consume fewer commodities, the decrease in the demand for commodities will be very great.†

'Let us endeavour, rapidly, to trace the consequences.

'The demand for tradesmen's goods being on the whole diminished, the quantity of business done will be lessened; but tradesmen struggle hard under such circumstances; they exert themselves to an extent scarcely to be conceived, to prevent a decrease in the quantity of business they had been accustomed to transact. Each will endeavour to supplant his neighbour by underselling him; but this can only be done by lessening profits; and the contention to retain old customers, and to procure new customers, will ruin a large number of tradesmen; and the same will be the result to manufacturers. As business continues to decline, and profits become less and less, tradesmen and manufacturers must discharge servants and work-people in great numbers, for whom no employment will be found. All persons employed in commerce, and dealers of all sorts, will be affected in the same way; and the consequences as they regard those persons will also be the same. Competition for employment amongst discharged servants and working-people, will lower wages, and produce a state of misery hitherto unknown. This appears to be a necessary, and consequently an inevitable result. But this state would not be patiently endured by either the working-people or their employers; and long before the misery of the working people became general, or their employers were ruined, an outcry would be heard, and the housekeepers, who have always had, and always must have, the power of the state in their hands, would refuse to pay taxes, and the Government would come to its end.'

Which refusal of taxes may a Reformed Parliament avert, by such anticipations, as may convert huge and forced tribute into light, reasonable, and willing assistance.

* 'It has been concluded, from calculations made to ascertain the fact, that an increase of one shilling per head per day, to every husbandry labourer above eighteen years of age, with a proportional rise to all below that age, and to women, and including only those who are actually employed, amounts to a sum greater than the whole rental received from land.

† 'If the condition of husbandry labourers should improve faster than servants, and work-people are compelled to come upon the parish, the poor-rate may for some time decrease, but it will soon again increase, and far exceed any amount it has hitherto reached.

* The distribution being altered as described, the price of food will rise, as the price of everything else from decrease of demand falls; and this would put out of employment many who are retained by persons not engaged in business, who are neither parsons nor landlords. The fall in the price of commodities, under these circumstances, will not compensate the rise in the price of food. The different distribution of food will, to some extent, tend to increase the quantity of food imported; and this is, as far as it goes, a mitigating circumstance; but as it does not at all invalidate the argument, it is therefore unnecessary to show how it would have this tendency, or to take any further notice of it.

† The price of food will rise, and the price of commodities will fall, and this will throw many out of employment who are now retained by persons who are neither parsons nor landlords, nor engaged in business. The fall in the price of commodities will not compensate the rise in the price of food.

SINGLE-LEGGED LADIES.—The "received position" among the ladies of Smyrna, is to sit with one leg on the sofa bent under them, and the other hanging over the edge—(the sofas are far too high for it to touch the ground.) You will see in this strange attitude, half a dozen ladies, sitting side by side on a long sofa. And a Frenchman who saw for the first time in his life, this unipedal exhibition, had reason to ask, "Si les belles dames de Smyrne n'avaient qu'une jambe?"—Mac Farlane's Constantinople.—[This reminds one of the story in Boccaccio, of the Cook and the Crane; in which the former having been tempted, by its fine savour, to eat one of the legs of the bird which he had dressed for his master's dinner, was called to account for serving it up in that imperfect state; and boldly answered that cranes had but one leg. To convince his master, he proposed to show him some of the living birds. The master acquiesced, the birds were sleeping, and one leg only was visible; but a cry of huish soon awakened them, and discovered the second. The cook, however, was not at a loss for an answer:—he objected that his master had not cried huish to the roasted bird. The Frenchman should have cried huish to the ladies of Smyrna.]

BY THE ORIGINAL THEATRICAL CRITIC IN THE EXAMINER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

DRURY LANE.—A Grand Musical Performance.

DRURY LANE.

WE cannot say much for the main part of what we heard at the Oratorio last night. Not that some of the singers, and of the pieces too, were not excellent; but, as we before observed, there is so much ordinary matter mixed up with them, and bad music, though not exciting like good, is so wearisome a repose after it, that we can never sit out half of one of these entertainments without getting tired. We are sorry we arrived in time only to hear the conclusion of Total Eclipse, sung by Mr BRAHAM,—written by one of the greatest of musicians, blind, to the words of one of the greatest of poets, blind also.

> " O loss of sight, &c.
> Total eclipse! No sun, no moon, no stars:
> Dark, dark, irrecoverably dark,
> Dark 'mid the blaze of noon."

We are ashamed at not remembering the passage, or being able to call to mind how much of it is set by HANDEL. MILTON, in the case of Samson, was describing his own,—one of the English Samsons, who pulled down the House of Lords. It is said that on one occasion, while presiding in the orchestra at the performance of this composition, HANDEL was so moved, that the tears were seen pouring out of his blind eyes. Mr BRAHAM would not have diminished them.

There was a great deal too much ROSSINI in this night's entertainment. His " gravities " are not so good as his " gaieties," especially in the choral part. He has too much > —— ' Gun, drum, trumpet, blunderbuss, and thunder.'

We cannot think more highly,—nor indeed so much so,—of M. VON WEBER'S Grand Scene—' Oh, tis a glorious sight to see!' It is a literal, vulgar composition, of loud and soft, all obvious and old. And SPONTINI'S Grand Overture to Olympia disappointed us. We knew nothing of him but from the Overture to Semiramide, which we heard the first night of these performances, and which it has been upon our conscience to have omitted noticing. We thought there was wonderful energy and movement in that Overture. It was like an army of cavalry going to battle. There is energy in the Overture to Olympia, and some hint of a like character; but it struck us as common-place, compared with the other. SPONTINI has a fine way of making the upper notes of his wind instruments tell over the rest,—like a sort of continued and stormy hilarity. We fancy him able to set Polyphemus's reeds to music, blowing from the top of Mount Ætna, and making the waters whistle back over the beach.

Mrs WAYLETT sang very prettily the Hymn of Eve; and Miss PEARSON was to have sung Come ever smiling Liberty, but some injudicious person (probably the same who has done it before, and whose good-nature ought to be more discreet) provoked opposition by the sudden and solitary vehemence of his applause before-hand. He clapped as if he had been fairly stung with transport by anticipation. Now there is unfortunately an opinion prevalent among the frequenters of the theatre, that this young lady, however well she may be grounded in the rudiments of her art, has been too prominently or prematurely brought forward; and though the clapping gave rise to more, and the audience ultimately encouraged her all they could, yet the hissing it also gave rise to, made her burst into tears, and rendered her unable to proceed. We hope her friends will be more discreet another time. They should do it, if only to save her from the equivocal pathos of the tears; which her enemies will be as ready to set down to the account of spleen and anger, as her encouragers of sensibility. Miss PEARSON afterwards sung in a duet with Miss RUSSELL, and had recovered herself sufficiently to obtain applause.

But the best thing we heard was a Laughing Trio from MARTINI. The success which La Mia Dorabella met with the other night, suggested, we suppose, this addition to the laughing stock. It is a capital good one, short and sweet; and fairly set the house in a sympathetic roar, twice, nay three times; for it was twice encored. The performers were Miss HUGHES, SINCLAIR, and PHILLIPS, all of whom duly played their parts, but particularly PHILLIPS, who threw himself so heartily into the spirit of the thing, that the English audience fancied he could not help himself; and part of their enjoyment was evidently occasioned by that notion. It is possible that the lively fancy of this singer might really have thus carried him away; but it is a curious instance of the ordinary gravity of our countrymen, that would attribute his admirable performance only to his being unable to help laughing, and not to his relish of the composition. However, there were, doubtless, many who understood him too. At all events, the audience were themselves fairly carried out of their usual temperance of enjoyment. The first encore was uproarious. As to the second, which was not wanting in vivacity either, we shall make bold to lay claim to a part in it. The glory of helping the people to a good thing in this world is not to be lost. We shall waive our claims on the Ministers for having advocated Reform these twenty years. We shall say nothing of the wear and tear we have gone through in the service of the freedom of discussion and liberal opinion of all sorts. But nothing shall induce us to conceal, that it was we, whose lifted up and most additional encore finally brought the question of a third performance of Vadasi via di qua to a successful issue, and so made an English audience thrice happy in one evening. ☞

CHARACTERISTIC ANECDOTES OF TALLEYRAND.—" Talleyrand's countenance," added the Emperor, " is so immoveable, that nothing can ever be read in it. Lannes and Murat used jokingly to say of him, that, if while he was speaking to you, some one should come behind him and give him a kick, his countenance would betray no indication of the affront."—M. de Talleyrand is mild and even endearing in his domestic habits. His servants, and the individuals in his employment, are attached and devoted to him. Among his intimate friends, he willingly and good-humouredly speaks of his ecclesiastic profession. He one day expressed his dislike af a tune which was played in his hearing. He said he had a great horror of it: it recalled to his recollection the time when he was obliged to practise church-music, and to sing at a desk. On another occasion, one of his intimate friends was telling a story during supper, while M. de Talleyrand was engaged in thought, and seemed inattentive to the conversation. In the course of the story, the speaker happened to say in a lively manner, of some one whom he had named, " that fellow is a comical rogue; he is a married priest." Talleyrand, roused by these words, seized a spoon, plunged it hastily into the dish before him, and with a threatening aspect, called out to him, " Mr Such-a-one, will you have some spinage?" The person who was telling the story was confounded, and all the party burst into a fit of laughter, M. de Talleyrand as well as the rest.—Las Casas' Journal.

THE NATIONAL DEBT.—The Emperor concluded with these remarkable observations:—" England and France held in their hands the fate of the world; and particularly that of European civilization. What injury did we not do each other! What good might we not have done! Under Pitt's system we desolated the world; and what has been the result? You imposed on France a tax of fifteen hundred millions of francs, and raised it by means of Cossacks. I laid a tax of seven thousand millions on you, and made you raise it with your own hands, by your Parliament. Even now, after the victory you have obtained, who can tell whether you may not, sooner or later, sink under the weight of such a burden? With Fox's system, we should have understood each other, we should have accomplished and preserved the emancipation of nations, the dominion of principles. Europe would have presented but a single fleet, and a single army. We might have ruled the world. We might every where have established peace and prosperity, either by dint of force or persuasion.—Yes, I repeat, what mischief have we done! What good might we not have effected!" —Las Cases' Journal.—[It is melancholy to think, that if this great soldier had been as great a man in other respects as he fancied himself, he alone might have done all this, by maintaining a republic, and leading the intellect and conscious right of the world.]

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

WE thought our friends had become singularly slack in their epistolary favours. Last night we received a packet of letters, which had evidently been accumulating in the publisher's box; but we got them so late, that we must defer them until our next.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

MONDAY, MARCH 7, 1831.

TO ADVERTISERS.

On Monday the 14th inst. The Tatler will begin to admit Advertisements, but under such an arrangement of its letter-press as will take nothing from the reader.

This opportunity may be particularly worthy the attention of those who deal in commodities conducive in any way to the Graces of Life, whether intellectual or external, such as Books, Music, Paintings, Engravings, Sculpture, Apparel, Jewellery, or any kind of Fancy Article; in short, anything connected with habits of elegance and refinement.

The space of The Tatler devoted to this purpose will be of necessity a great deal smaller than in other Daily Papers, so that every Advertisement will be sure of being seen; and Advertisers will bear in mind, that as the readers of the paper consist of Play-goers, Men of Leisure, Actors and Actresses, Accomplished Women in general, the Lovers of Books, Music, &c., and other cultivators of social intercourse and amusement, they form the very description of persons who are the most likely to repay the use made of its columns.

Advertisements received at the Tatler Office, 4 Catherine street, Strand; also by Mr G. Reynell, Country Newspaper and General Advertising Office, 42 Chancery lane; and by Messrs C. and W. Reynell, at the Printing Office, 45 Broad street, Golden square.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

The Annual Retrospect of Public Affairs, for 1831. In Two Volumes. Volume the First. 12mo. pp. 320. (Third Vol. of Dr Lardner's Cabinet Library.) Longman.

It was a judicious thought in Dr Lardner to commence a publication of this sort at the present moment: for never was the state of the world so interesting. There have been epochs as startling, perhaps more so, on account of the calm which preceded them, or their unexpectedness on the part of the general community. The death of Charles the First constituted one. The first French Revolution brought another. But at no period in history have events taken place of such mighty magnitude of interest to all mankind. At no period have the countless myriads of human faces been turned, now to this quarter of Europe, and now to that, to see what new benefit is to arise, what old and almost despairing wish is to be realized, what earnest of better days is to be given to poverty, what strength to the belief in good, what joy to sincerity, what "ardour to virtue," and "confidence to hope." Dryden talked of his "Annus Mirabilis," because it had a fire in it, and a plague, and a victory over the Dutch! What a poor year of wonders was that, compared with the one of these times! Every year is now an Annus Mirabilis.

It is intended, in this portion of the Cabinet Library, to give a volume a year; but the Retrospect is so unusually interesting in the present instance, and takes in so wide a field, that the Editor says it has been found impossible to confine it to the proposed limit. It is therefore intended to give us two volumes. In the one now published, "A view of the state of politics at the close of 1829 is followed by an account of the proceedings of the British Parliament until the decease of the late King, with some notice of that monarch and his successor. The political state of France before the revolution of July, and the various causes which led to the event, form the subject of the next chapter:" and "the remainder of the volume is devoted to the discussion of the past political changes produced in France and Belgium."

We shall speak more of the book to-morrow. At present we must content ourselves with extracting from it the character of his late Majesty George the Fourth, which is written with a truth (however paradoxical it may seem) at once liberal and severe,—liberal in not forgetting the causes of error, severe in not mincing the result. Another publication of this Cabinet series has lately given a more detailed account of his Majesty; and it may be asked why we repeat this new judgment about him. We answer, for the same reason that induced the writer to give it; namely, a conviction that people are a long while before they cease to attach consequence to the history of a lately deceased Monarch, especially if his life seemed willing to elude detection, and the more that is known of him, the more surprising it becomes that such a man could have been of any consequence! We like to read of such men as Frederick, and Napoleon, and Washington, and La Fayette, because they have extraordinary characters, and have taken a necessary part in great events:—and we like to read of such men as George the Fourth, because they have characters so ordinary as to make their very mediocrity singular, in connection with the circumstances that made its actions important. We here see one of the commonest of mankind (for we cannot but be astonished at what the author says of his intellect) occupying by chance one of the most important positions in society, enabled, also by chance, to influence the greatest events and the actions of the greatest men, and thus rendered by chance an object of interest to all the world, when, in any other station than the one he occupied, people would have thought no more of him than they do of their haberdasher! As Sir Hugh Evans would say, "This is pretty superiorities!"

'The character of George IV. has, like that of every other prince, living or recently dead, been drawn with very different colours by different hands; with some it has been made the subject of extravagant eulogy, and with others of undeserved censure. Those who are disposed to extend their indulgent connivance to the errors and vices of monarchs, and who reserve their prying criticism for a vulgar station, hold him up nearly as a model of perfection; while he has been as unjustly mangled by another class of critics, who feel a particular predilection to apply their scalping-knife to crowned heads; and who, like the ancient priests, delight to select their victims from rare and consecrated races. But George IV. was neither much better nor much worse than the average run of princes brought up in the perpetual view of a throne, released from the restraints of prudence at the age when passion is strongest, and placed in all stages of his life beyond the sphere of the common motives of ambition, or fear of degradation, which actuate other men.

'As a king, in the exercise of his authority, he understood his age and nation. With the professional proneness of his caste to exalt prerogative, he never ostensibly allowed it to interfere with the ascertained rights or settled opinions of his subjects. Though he was never known to suggest reform or repairs in the social edifice, and busied himself rather with questionable innovations in more vulgar architecture, he was too enlightened to oppose those changes in the national policy, which the progress of knowledge had rendered necessary, and which were suggested or supported by his responsible advisers. Accordingly, the latter ten years of his reign will always be memorable in the annals of England, for the ameliorations of our commercial code, for improvements in our criminal laws, and for the abolition of sectarian distinctions and qualifications for civil privileges.

'In the domestic relations of his life, or in the selection of his private associates, his warmest friends can say nothing in his praise. The great vice of his character seemed to be an intense selfishness, which could neither share nor excite strong sympathy,—which could make no sacrifice and incur no trouble for others,—which taught him to consult only his own humours, his own caprices, and his own ease, as the supreme law for those about him, as well as for himself,—and which never calculated at what cost to others he purchased his own gratifications, whether of power, pride, taste, luxury, or wit, or sensual indulgence, provided he secured them. Hence his extravagance in expenditure, and the careless indifference with which he applied to the national purse. Hence he is described as never knowing the value of money, because he never could conceive anything too valuable in gratifying his desires—whether they took the direction of the turf or the gaming-table; whether they prompted him to entertain buffoons or to patronize the arts—to buy trinkets or to build palaces. Hence, for his amusement, he often tempted to familiarities which he resented, and reconciled his condescension with his dignity, by the merciless sacrifice of the hapless dependant, who in presuming upon the one offended the other. Hence he selected for his ministers those public men, who, in conducting his government, would give him least trouble; and passed a sentence of arbitrary exclusion against all others, from personal pique or prejudice.

'In making this last remark we by no means intend to insinuate that on any extraordinary emergency, during any great party conflict, or with any great national interest at stake, he would have allowed his love of ease, or his feeling of personal partialities, to influence his mind in the choice of his servants; but happily such occasions seldom occur; and the propensity to which we allude, may, in ordinary times, produce considerable mischief, though it would be overpowered by extraordinary circumstances—by the presence of great dangers, or the demands for great exertions. It probably was the secret cause of the dissolution of the Goderich administration, the formation of the Wellington cabinet, and the continued exclusion of Lord Grey from any share of power.

'As a part of the same character, it may be remarked, that he was incapable of disinterested friendship or constant attachment. In the early part of his life, he was cordial with those whom he admitted into his society, or who administered to his pleasures; but he never forgot the distance between the heir apparent to the throne and a subject, and, while he expected fidelity and submission, shewed no return of lasting regard. The slightest cause of irritation, the least unauthorized encroachment on his kindness beyond the prescribed bounds, severed the frail tie. His connexion with Mr Fox was one of politics, not of friendship; but from the terms on which they lived, a generous confidence in the great statesman whom he admired, ought to have prevented him from making him the dupe of falsehood, in the case of his marriage with Mrs Fitzherbert. His treatment of Sheridan, who was so long his adviser in difficulties,—the promoter of his pleasures,—the companion and ornament of his convivial hours, and whom he deserted in the last stage of wretchedness and neglect, when his wit was no longer required to enliven, nor his talents to guide him, will for ever remain a proof of his heartlessness. It is, indeed, true that before his "evil days came on," Sheridan had been wanting to himself, to his brilliant talents, to his immortal reputation; but he had not failed in his duty to the prince: he had contracted no habits which the prince had not sanctioned by his example, or encouraged by his society; and a small pittance from that immense income, which was now squandered with more reckless profusion than his smaller allowance in the period of their common extravagance, might have rescued him a few years longer from the grave, or rendered his descent into it less gloomy, forlorn, or deserted.

'Most of those who shared his familiarities or were admitted to his table at the early part of his life, had been discarded before its close; and not one man of brilliant parts or independent character was ever voluntarily invited to a continued intercourse, or could endure the terms at which it must be purchased.

'On the other hand, it need not be said that his resentments and antipathies were less fleeting than his friendships. His insulting treatment of his wife immediately on their marriage, and his continued course of persecution after their separation, must be censured by those who might not be disposed to break a lance in defence of the purity or prudence of his wife's conduct. Without alluding to any further instances of this unforgiving disposition, it may be sufficient to say, that, for causes unknown to his Royal Highness, his aversion to his brother the duke of Sussex was not overcome even at the prospect of death.

'That he was a man of cultivated understanding and varied accomplishments his bitterest enemies cannot deny. (!!) His skill in music and his taste in pictures were universally admitted. His acquaintance with literature, science, and politics, was probably greater than that of any contemporary sovereign; and none of his brother Monarchs understood more profoundly the laws and mysteries of court fashion, or could exhibit in more finished perfection the polish and elegance of court manners. The eulogy on his character by the Duke of Wellington, on proposing the address of condolence on his death, will not be contested, so far as intellectual accomplishment is concerned; and, were it not that his flatterers have claimed for him every virtue under heaven, we might, probably, have spared the few harsh remarks which we have been compelled to make on his moral habits and general principles of action.

'The death of George the Fourth had been so long expected, that it produced but slight sensation when it occurred. The public had been allowed to know so little about his malady or his sufferings,—he had kept himself in such strict retirement, and seemed so much to shrink from popular sympathy, that little regret was either felt or expressed at the event.

'Very different was the strength of feeling with which the accession of his successor, William IV, was hailed. The lowest of the people seemed sensible to the contrast between the manners of the two monarchs. The new sovereign exhibited himself to his people, conversed with them, and shared in their tastes and amusements. He was understood to have contracted no habits of extravagance; and he showed no haughty disdain of popular approbation. Though he retained the ministers, and professed to act on the political system of his predecessor, he immediately acquired a great share of popularity, which was peculiarly due to his own frank nature, and affable deportment. His instant promotion of some of his old friends, such as Sir Sydney Smith, his well-timed liberalities, and his total disregard of party distinctions in receiving the homage of his subjects, afforded the best omen of a happy reign.'—P. 126.

The only fault we have to find with this character is the opinion the author has expressed relative to the amount of George the Fourth's intellect and accomplishments. We must again express our amazement that he can apply such terms to that Prince. We have more than once noticed the extraordinary delusion which the acutest of observers, on other points of his history, seem willing to entertain on this; and can only account for it by supposing, that they have never recovered the gallant ideas given them when they were young respecting the Prince of Wales. Yet surely, his Dutch taste in pictures, his miserable taste in architecture, his incoherent and ungrammatical letters, and the testimonies of one like Sir Philip Francis, who absolutely manœuvred to avoid dining with him, because he was so dull and tiresome, (to say nothing of all which he did, and all which he did not do!) are sufficient to overthrow the fondest dreams on this head, bequeathed us by the delight of our grandmothers.

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

"The little and short sayings of wise and excellent men are of great value, like the dust of gold, or the least sparks of diamonds."—Tillotson.

Royal Play-going.—A king ought now and then to take pleasure in hearing and reading of comedies, because thereby he may perceive and hear many things done in his realm, which otherwise he would not know.—Wit's Commonwealth.

Charlemagne was of lofty stature and immense strength, and notwithstanding his infamous massacre of the Saxons, adorned with many good as well as great qualities. He was sober in his tastes, just in his legislative capacity, and a lover of generosity, which by his study of economy, he was able to practise. He administered the business of his family and personal domains with as much strictness as that of his empire, and even sold the herbs of his garden. He was a good master, a good father, and a good friend; for the other side of his character, it need only be said that he was a conqueror and a king.—Notes to Ritchie's Romance of History.

Good Manners is the art of making those people easy, with whom we converse. Whoever makes the fewest persons uneasy, is the best bred in the company.—Swift.

Ceremony.—I have seen a duchess fairly knocked down by the precipitancy of an officious coxcomb, running to save her the trouble of opening a door. I remember, upon a birth-day at court, a great lady was utterly disconsolate by a dish of sauce let fall by a page directly upon her head dress and brocade; while she gave a sudden turn to her elbow upon some point of ceremony with the person who sat next her. Monsieur Boys, the Dutch Envoy, whose politics and manners were much of a size, brought a son with him, about thirteen years old, to a great table at court. The boy and his father, whatever they put on their plates they first offered round in order, to every person in company, so that we could not get a minute's quiet during the whole dinner. At last their two plates happened to encounter, and with so much violence, that being china, they broke in twenty pieces; and stained half the company with wet sweat-meats and cream.—Swift.

Musical Notes of Screech-Owls.—Mr White, in one of his delightful letters to Mr Pennant, says, "My musical friend, at whose house (Fyfeld, near Andover) I am now visiting, has tried all the owls that are his near neighbours, with a pitch-pipe set at concert pitch, and finds they all hoot in B flat. He will examine the nightingales next spring." From what follows this note, it, however, appears, that "neither owls nor cuckoos keep to one note."—Knowledge for the People, Part IV.

A Noble Gift makes Noble Gratitude.—A lady residing at the Mauritius, many years ago, emancipated a slave whose good conduct and fidelity she wished to reward: being in affluent circumstances, she gave him, with his freedom, a sum of money which enabled him to establish himself in business, and being very industrious and thrifty, he soon became rich enough to purchase a small estate in the country, whither he retired with his family.—Years passed away, and while he was rapidly accumulating money, his former mistress was sinking into poverty; misfortune had overtaken her, and she found herself in old age, poor, solitary, neglected, and in want of the common comforts of life:—this man heard of her unhappy condition, and immediately came to the town, and sought her out in her humble abode: with the utmost respect he expressed his concern at finding his honoured lady in so reduced a state, and implored her to come to his estate, and allow him the gratification of providing for her future comforts. The lady was much affected at the feeling evinced by her old servant, but declined his offer; he could not however, be prevailed on to relinquish his design: "My good mistress," said he, "oblige me by accepting my services; when you were rich, you were kind to me; you gave me freedom and money, with which, through God's blessing, I have been enabled to make myself comfortable in life; and now I only do my duty in asking you to share my prosperity when you are in need." His urgent entreaties at length prevailed, and the lady was conveyed in his palanquin, to the comfortable and well-furnished apartments assigned to her by his grateful care; his wife and daughters received her with the utmost respect, and always shewed, by their conduct, that they considered themselves her servants: deserted by those who had been her equals in station, and who had professed themselves her friends while in affluence, this good lady passed the remainder of her days in comfort and ease, amid those who had been her dependants.—A Lady's Recollections of the Mauritius.

CHARACTER OF FRENCH AND ENGLISH UNDERSTANDINGS.—I never saw men of better understanding than the French who apply themselves to consider things with due attention; and the English that can shake off their too deep meditations, to return to that faculty of discourse, and freedom of wit, which, if possible, ought always to be had. The finest gentlemen in the world are the French that think, and the English that speak.—St Evremond.

WAR ON THE TOM-TITS.—It may have been requisite in former times to keep under or reduce the numbers of many predaceous animals, which, in a thickly-wooded country, with an inferior population, might have been productive of injury; and we even find parliamentary statutes enacted for this purpose: but now, however, our loss by such means has become a very petty grievance; our gamekeepers do their part in removing pests of this nature, and the plough and the axe leave but little harbour for the few that escape; and thus we war on the smaller creatures of creation, and call them vermin. An item passed in one of our churchwardens' accounts, was, "for seventeen dozen of tomtits' heads!" In what evil hour, or for what crime, this poor little bird can have incurred the anathema of a parish, it is difficult to conjecture. The price set upon its head is four-pence per dozen, probably the ancient payment when the groat was a coin.—Knapp.

A PRETENDED ANSWER TO A LETTER THAT NEVER WAS WRITTEN.—[This is one of Swift's jokes, written to Stella; and excellent of its kind. Nothing can be more natural, or like notices of what had actually occurred.]—Dr Swift to Mrs Johnson.—"Jack Grattan said nothing to me of it till last night; it is none of my fault: how did I know you were to dine abroad? You should have sent your messenger sooner; yes, I think the dinner you provided for yourself may do well enough here; but pray send it soon. I wish you would give a body more early warning, but you must blame yourselves. Delany says, 'He will come in the evening;' and for aught I know, Sheridan may be here at dinner. Which of you was it that undertook this frolic? Your letter hardly explained your meaning, but at last I found it. Pray do not serve me these tricks often. You may be sure, if there be a good bottle, you shall have it. I am sure I never refused you, and therefore that reflection might have been spared. Pray be more positive in your answer to this.

"Deanry House, Sunday Morning, April 30, 1721.

"Margoose, and not Mergoose; it is spelt with an a, simpleton.

"No, I am pretty well after my walk. I am glad Archdeacon P. got home safe, and I hope you take care of him. It was his own fault; how could I know where he was? and he could have easily overtaken me; for I walked softly on purpose; I told Delany I would."

A TRAVELLER HAUNTED BY FIGS.—The musquitoes were as tormenting as ever, and I found another annoyance nearly as vexatious, superadded to the miseries of Smyrna: it was the fig-trade. This interesting branch of commerce was then in its full activity; you could not stir in the narrow streets for the long lines of camels loaded with figs; you could hardly move on the Marina for the drums of figs rolling to be shipped; you could not sleep after three o'clock in the morning, for the noise of some two or three hundred women and children employed in picking and packing figs. You heard nothing around you, and about you, but talk of figs. "How are figs? What's the price of figs?" rang in your ears from morning till night, through the agreeable variety afforded by the different organs of every man you met. You would have thought that the whole mind of Smyrna had become one vast receptacle of sweetmeats. If you asked for news, you were told figs were getting up. If you complained of the heat, you were informed that the figs were luxuriously ripe. If you drank to a person at table, it was ten to one but his soul was below stairs with his drums. In short, the parody in the 'Rejected Addresses,' "In the name of the prophet, Figs!" would have been no parody in Smyrna during the long month of September. * * * * I was sailing quietly out of the bay for Chesmé, leaving behind me, to my infinite satisfaction, the musquitoes and figs of Smyrna; but I was not yet so clear of the latter pest as I imagined; the ship I was in was partly loaded with figs. In going below to bed in the evening, a new affliction awaited me. I had scarcely laid myself down, when I felt something crawling over me; presently a creeping procession was formed on every part of my body. I called lustily for a light to kill the bugs. The cabin boy came in with an intelligent grin; and by the lamp I found I was covered, not with the dark brown foul reptile, "familiar to man," but with innumerable long white worms or maggots, that issue, as I was then told, from the fresh-packed figs, and insinuate themselves into every corner of the ship, and circulate or nestle until the uncongenial clime of the north destroys them. I was informed, moreover, that they were perfectly sweet, and quite innocent, and that "they only tickled." * * * * The next morning these white vermin fell in my coffee from the beams of the deck—on my plate, almost into my mouth; and on taking my book, I found them running through its pages. The malediction of Anastatius against opium could hardly have been bitterer than what I ejected against figs. His curse, he flattered himself, took effect; but I have now the charity to hope mine will not, as it would destroy one of the great resources of Smyrna. * * * As I had got somewhat used to the fig-worms, I slept soundly this night, and the morning was awakened with the glad tidings that breakfast was ready, and that we had just come to anchor at Chesmé."—Mac Farlane's Constantinople.

DRURY LANE.

THEATRICAL audiences of late have been so good-natured, that it was a singular thing here on Saturday night to witness the damnation of the new piece, Decorum; or, Very Suspicious,—a damnation too of the old sort, with groans, yells, cat-calls, and the general cry of "Off! Off!" There were some clapping hands here and there, that struggled with the uproar; but the disapprobation was so persevering, that the latter scenes were performed in dumb show, and apparently hurried through in order to secure the chance of a second night. We think it would be judicious in the author to withdraw his piece. The good points are too rare, and the intervals heavy. With some of the prominent characters the audience have no general sympathy,—as that of an old maid (Mrs C. HILL) who lives in a horror of indecorums; and of a lady's maid (Mrs ORGER) who urges pretensions to genteel treatment with too passionate a sincerity. Then the chief character of all (FARREN'S), whose suspiciousness amounts to disease, and who thinks that his wife is poisoning him, is of very doubtful comedy. At all events, it is very hazardous, and requires a hand like MOLIÈRE'S to invest it with such circumstances as shall be irresistibly ludicrous, and so occupy us entirely with its fantasticalness. Now Mr Fusselton is all but a madman; calls for the "stomach-pump" at the merest hint of his fancy, and has friends about him who take the matter seriously, and tax Mrs Fusselton with murder; upon which the lady indignantly drinks the supposed poison "as her only answer," and then falls to humming a song. Now all this voluntary tragedy is too heavy to be carried off by a song. All the characters are over-wrought, and made too serious and incorrect. We have heard the author's name, but do not mention it, as his next effort may probably be more successful, and damnations are not always proportioned to demerits. We cannot say, that we think the piece ought to have succeeded, but we have seen worse do so. It is right however to add, that the audience, up to a late point, manifested repeated inclination to hear the piece out. Considerable intervals of silence prevailed in the house, of a very unusual description. Nor must it be omitted that the principal performers (Mr FARREN, Mrs ORGER, &c.) never played better. The failure of the author seems to have lain in misdirected painstaking; but this, while it conciliates criticism, is apt to make the audience more tired, and weary them out. He must therefore do his best to profit by experience, and console himself meanwhile with reflecting, that among the damned there is illustrious company,—FIELDING, DRYDEN, CONGREVE, SHERIDAN, FLETCHER, BEN JONSON, *cum multis aliis.

* Since writing this article, we observe by the play-bills, that the piece s withdrawn.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

The Fourth Edition of "Laconics" has not been received by the Editor.

H. M. C. is under consideration.

The communications of the writer, who signs with a French name, will be very welcome.

We do not understand the drift of the "Lines written for an Empty Grave."

The letter from Camden Town is arrived.

"Literary Intelligence" is an advertisement.

We are obliged to J. L. G.; but the subject is not worth his lines.

We hardly know what to do with so large and flattering a looking-glass as DRAYTON CLIFFE'S letter has opened upon us. But we must try to give a portion of it.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

TUESDAY, MARCH 8, 1831.

TO ADVERTISERS.

On Monday the 14th inst. THE TATLER will begin to admit Advertisements, but under such an arrangement of its letter-press as will take nothing from the reader.

This opportunity may be particularly worthy the attention of those who deal in commodities conducive in any way to the Graces of Life, whether intellectual or external, such as Books, Music, Paintings, Engravings, Sculpture, Apparel, Jewellery, or any kind of Fancy Article; in short, anything connected with habits of elegance and refinement.

The space of THE TATLER devoted to this purpose will be of necessity a great deal smaller than in other Daily Papers, so that EVERY ADVERTISEMENT will be sure of being seen; and Advertisers will bear in mind, that as the readers of the paper consist of Play-goers, Men of Leisure, Actors and Actresses, Accomplished Women in general, the Lovers of Books, Music, &c., and other cultivators of social intercourse and amusement, they form the very description of persons who are the most likely to repay the use made of its columns.

Advertisements received at the TATLER OFFICE, 4 Catherine street, Strand; also by Mr G. REYNELL, Country Newspaper and General Advertising Office, 42 Chancery lane; and by Messrs C. and W. REYNELL, at the Printing Office, 45 Broad street, Golden square.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

The Annual Retrospect of Public Affairs, for 1831. In Two Volumes. Volume the First. 12mo. pp. 320. (Third Vol. of Dr Lardner's Cabinet Library.) Longman.

THE most interesting passage of this volume, at the present moment, is the following selection of testimonies to the distresses of the country, as laid in vain before the unreformed Parliament of last year. The arguments for considering them in a committee were met and destroyed by the assertion, that a committee would be of no use: and we agree with it. So the distresses went on, and the burnings followed; and meanwhile the events took place in Paris, and we are now to have the Parliament reformed. The first subject of enquiry, when the reformation has taken place, must be, "What is to be done for the starving part of the people of England?" We grudge nobody his comforts: we grudge nobody his luxuries, as long as they do not render him unfeeling: but it is frightful to see the opponents of this admirable measure of Government coming down, night after night, to the House, with their warm, well-fed bodies, and insolent eyes, and repeating the disgusting falsehood about the national content and prosperity, while thousands of Englishmen are shivering, and famishing, and fierce with wretchedness. In some, it is true, we believe it to be sheer want of imagination,—the pure inability to conceive anything out of their own sphere, or to feel a pain which they do not themselves undergo. Should any of our readers deem this incredible, we would illustrate its possibility by the example of boys who torment cockchafers, and grown men who ride horses to death, or hunt down a shrieking hare. It is not that they are deliberately cruel, but that they are habitually dull and thoughtless, cannot admit, without compulsion, an idea distinct from their self-complacency, and when compelled to get a glimpse of another, recoil from it as an injury done to themselves! We happened to sit near such a man the other night at the play. He was a fat, burly fellow, with his chin in his neckcloth, who had evidently degluted a hasty dinner to come and see a popular performance, and who had poured the due quantity of wine over his three courses, with which his face was red, and his voice bland and buttery. He had an incipient asthma, made little adoring bows of recognition to certain other fine people in the front rows (which made us take him for a master-cook), had a great bunch of seals to his plethora, and was altogether a most effeminate potency. He was unquestionably either a master-cook, or a boroughmonger's agent, or one of those serviles now about to be turned out of Parliament, whom nature intended for butlers, and a fat sympathy sometimes makes companions of Dukes. We have seen Dukes as like them as brothers. A gentleman next him was telling this personage how troubled he had been, during a visit to the country, to find that there was so much distress, and that poor men with families were earning no more than four and five shillings a week. "Depend upon it, Sir," said the other, in a voice as bland as before, and tumbling his seals about, "that you were imposed upon. Nothing but pretence, Sir: nothing but pretence, and rebellion, and the wish to create confusion, Sir. Impostors are always to be found, who make a pretence of poverty. There is no end of them." With this refutation the gentleman seemed by no means satisfied, but the speaker was. He made a little calm, asthmatic hem, settled himself more luxuriously in his place, and watched, with happy eyes, the opening of the second act.

This man was a fool. There are others, who have not his excuse; but some may be allowed to have half of it. Ignorance and insolence divide them into two blissful parts. The rest have no excuse at all, but that of a disbelief in all virtue and hope, which is, to be sure, itself a folly, and which teaches them to care nothing but for their own profit, to lie and bully as hard as they please, and to take all mankind for a parcel of slaves like themselves. They will lie to the last; but with very different effect from what they did when in power: for the prosperity of their lying required the sanction of their worldly success. Some men would be dazzled too much to inspect it; others would love it, out of their own natural vulgarity; and others would feel a sort of instinctive superstition at it, as a thing permitted by Providence for its "inscrutable purposes,"—a fine phrase, always at hand as a last argument to vindicate submission.

But to our extracts.—The writer is speaking of the Session of Parliament in February 1830.

"'The advocates for an enquiry,' says he, 'into the state of the country, having failed in the debate on the address, resolved to bring forward the subject of national distress on separate motions. In the meantime, they were reinforced by numerous petitions, which poured in from every part of the kingdom, to negative the ministerial declarations, and to shew the severity as well as the universality of the national sufferings. Some hundreds of these petitions have been printed by order of the House of Commons; and present a picture of poverty and misery drawn by the people themselves, the fidelity of which can scarcely be doubted, and the force of which can scarcely be increased. More than fifty of these petitions came from Kent, and describe a state of things which ought to have rendered the late tumults and conflagrations in that county no matter of surprise. One from Bedfordshire states that the labourers are 'receiving wages which give them barely the means of protracting a cheerless existence, deprived of all the comforts and almost all the necessaries of life.' This same petition mentions that there are parishes in the county, purely agricultural, where there are from fifty to ninety able bodied men, who, destitute of other work, are employed by the parishes and receiving four shillings a week, and that no blame attaches to the farmers who are unable to afford more. From a Berkhire county-meeting the same complaint is sent. The poor are said to be in a miserable state, 'their parish allowance and wages being scarcely sufficient to maintain even their existence. The weekly payments to able-bodied men who could not find employment, is stated in some places so low as two shillings and eight pence. There is no wonder therefore, that this country was latterly visited by disturbances, and a special commission. The picture drawn in these petitions of the state of Buckinghamshire is no less appalling. In one of them we are told that many persons commit depredations and misdemeanours to get into prison, thus to preserve themselves from lingering starvation, that many have contracted disorders by eating the flesh of animals that die naturally; and other unwholesome food; that their health suffers for want of fuel; and that when they apply to the parish they are charged with insolence, because they cannot starve and be contented.' Lord Nugent, who presented this petition, confirmed its statements from his personal knowledge.

'The following is a representation from the owners and occupiers of land in some districts of Cambridgeshire:—'The labourers, now no longer able to maintain themselves by the sweat of their brow, are driven to the scanty pittance derived from the parish fund-, which is doled out to them, not according to the labour received in return, but to the extent of their families: congregated on roads and in gravel pits, their spirits have become broken, and they are constantly repining at their hard condition, and inciting each other to vicious courses, while their employers are regarded as task-masters, and the ties of attachment to the land of their birth become gradually torn asunder." The petition from the county of Cumberland takes a wider range of complaint, and states that "the distress is not confined to one branch of productive industry, but at the same time and with equal pressure, weighs down the land-holder and the manufacturer, the shipowner and the miner, the employer and the labourer." The magistrates, landholders, and clergy of the county of Derby represent the state of that county as deplorable; "rents reduced and in arrear, tenants ruined, labourers unemployed, and farms thrown out of cultivation." We could multiply these representations, which have all nearly the same features, from Essex, from Norfolk, from Hampshire, from Hertfordshire, and from every other county in England; but we shall only cite one or two examples more. In a petition from Louth in the same county, it is stated that "labourers are without employment; crime encreases; the bonds of society are loosened; and, from the peer to the peasant, all classes are rapidly approaching to ruin, misery, and starvation; which, if not arrested, must terminate in convulsion. "A petition from the parish of Rendham, in Suffolk, predicted what has subsequently taken place. It stated that "the poor-rates have been progressively increasing for some years; and that the petitioners are seriously afraid that sufferings so severe, although they have hitherto been borne with exemplary patience, will end in general riot and confusion." In a petition from the farmers, freeholders, and others of Croydon, in Surrey, the petitioners state that they "can no longer endure to see their fellow-countrymen who are born to the lot of labourers starving under their eyes; that they shudder under the reflection that, without some timely aid, such will soon be their own lot." The last example of distress which we shall cite from this long list of grievances is contained in a petition from Frome, in Somersetshire, the correctness of which was vouched for by the Bishop of Bath and Wells, who presented it to the House of Peers. "That there is no disinclination," say the petitioners, "in the poor to labour during this inclement season: numerous men, women, and children, may be seen dragging loads of coal up the steep hills on the road from the coal-pits to Frome, for a very small recompense." "I have been," said the right reverend prelate, "a witness to the most afflicting distress, and which I could not, if I would, describe. I have seen with my own eyes multitudes who could obtain no work and were starving; others yoked together like oxen, drawing coals from the pits in the neighbourhood."

'On the 25th of February a long discussion took place in the House of Peers on the state of the country, thus described, on the motion of Lord Stanhope for a Committee of enquiry. His Lordship dwelt particularly on the depressed state of the agricultural interest. He expressed his belief that there was not one occupier of land, from one extremity of the land to the other, who would not eventually be involved in difficulty and distress. He said that rents were now paid in some places only, from profits, but in most from the capital, of the farmer. According to a statement in which his Lordship placed confidence, "the expense in cultivation, and the outgoings of the farmer, exclusive of rent, now exceed by six shillings the whole returns of an acre of land." In some parishes the proceeds do not suffice to maintain the poor; and they had been obliged to make application to the neighbouring parishes for assistance. The Noble Lord illustrated his view of the depreciation of all articles by a statement of prices. In looking at the foreign trade of the country, he found it equally depressed; for the excessive exports which had been mentioned in the King's speech had been measured in the quantities of commodities sent out of the country, and not in the real value of the returns obtained for them. The state of the revenue was likewise alarming. "Such was the natural tendency," he said, "of distress in all countries to encrease, that it would go on increasing; and the effects produced by it would become causes of its aggravation."—"The country," he thought, "was rapidly advancing to a state of bankruptcy—to a state of general disorganization, which will end in the total dissolution of the body politic. He called for enquiry to arrest the progress of these evils, or to ascertain whether their causes were beyond legislative remedy.

'The Duke of Richmond supported the motion, and gave a dreadful picture of the distress of the labouring poor, whom he described as placed on the parish roads at only 4d. or 3d. a day. "Who has not heard," cried he, "and who having heard can listen unmoved to the statement of British subjects, of British peasants guiltless of any crime, harnessed in the waggons of Cheshire, degraded to the offices of the brute creation? Yet this is not a solitary instance. The same has occured in other counties." At Blackburn there were 11,360 persons requiring assistance, whose entire incomes averaged only one shilling and sevenpence per week; and one third of Preston, namely 10,000, were receiving relief from the soup committee."—P. 82.

Now hear a quotation, made by a certain borough-mongering desperado, whom the late Mr Cumberland (this phrase requires classical authority) called "the talking potatoe." He is one of those writers in the Quarterly Review, who have been happily designated as "fellows with crape over their faces." Among friends however, the crape-men take off their crape; and thus accordingly, in his own visible and unblushing person, spoke he:—

'The present was but a fictitious and factitious alarm: they would recover themselves—they would regain their former station of peace and security if they had only patience and firmness.* It was possible, and nobody would deny it, that there might be a better arrangement of the constitutional elements than that which we possessed, but he did in his heart firmly believe that no human ingenuity could, à priori, have ever discovered an arrangement so well adapted to promote the prosperity, the wealth, the happiness, and liberty of the people. It was a constitution where—

'The jarring interests of themselves create
Th' according music of a well-mixed state.
Such is the world's great harmony that springs
From order, union, full consent of things:
Where small and great, where weak and mighty made
To serve, not suffer, strengthen not invade;
More powerful each as needful to the rest,
And, in proportion as it blesses, blest.'

Ri tiddy tum, te tum te riddle di,
To twaddle dee, and rum te teedle ti.

This happy quoter, by the way, is said to be the representative of the borough of Aldborough; but it is a mistake. He is Representative of one of the Peers,—Member for the Marquis of Hertford. This is the style in which he ought to be designated—The Hon. Member for the Marquis of Hertford. The plan should be adopted in all similar instances. Thus Sir Charles Wetherell is member, not for Boroughbridge, but for the Duke of Newcastle; Sir Henry Hardinge for the Duke of Northumberland; Mr John Villiers Shelley, for Lord Monson; Mr G. Bankes for Mr H. Bankes; and Mr Baring for himself!

How pleasant, how proper would it be, to hear the Lord Advocate of Scotland reply to the "Honourable Member for Mr H. Bankes," and the representative of Middlesex to the "Honourable Member for Himself!"

OBJECTION TO AN ORATORIO CUSTOM.

TO THE TATLER.

Mr Tatler,—A portion of your excellent Journal being devoted to Theatricals, I beg leave to call your attention to an abuse which has of late crept into our patent Theatres; and which, in my humble opinion, calls for some animadversion. I address myself to your publication, in the hope that the evil may be remedied in another quarter. Being a kind of "fanatico per la musica," I frequently look in to hear the Oratorios, or, as they are now with more propriety designated, "Selections of Music," which take place alternately at the two large theatres. Now, Sir, the abuse to which I allude is this:—One or two of our celebrated vocalists, whose names I do not deem it expedient to mention, have contracted a habit of retiring as soon as they have given a specimen of their vocal powers, and returning when their services are required. This has occurred more than once, and has been slightly adverted to by a contemporary journal; but I am sorry to perceive that the nuisance has not abated. It not only betrays a great want of sense, but savours very much of conceit, and is, besides, a mark of disrespect to the audience. As an inert spectator, it is far from my wish to be deficient in courtesy, especially to the female portion of our warblers; but I really think it would not be exacting too much to request, as a favor, that they would remain seated till the end of each act or division of the performance, when the whole body might retire. A word to the wise is enough. Should this breach of decorum continue, it will not be amiss if the names of the parties are shewn up. Hoping, however, that such publicity will not be courted, but that this gentle admonition may be as kindly taken as it is meant, by the parties to whom I allude, I remain,

Your admirer, and constant reader,

Philo Dramaticus.

[It would seem hard to insist that the gentlemen and ladies in question should sit any where longer than they feel inclined, provided their absence does us no harm. But the question is, whether the licence is taken on account of their rank, and denied to singers of an inferior grade. If so, we should say, at all events, that it would be a grace in them to waive the privilege. Perhaps the stage is cold:—perhaps it is felt disagreeable to sit so long and be stared at. Still, if others cannot retire because of the cold, the penalty of the lustre might be endured, to avoid implying a mortifying distinction]

* It is doubtful whether by the word they the speaker means the boroughmongers or the people. If the boroughmongers, we are to understand by "patience and firmness," good dinners and non-concession. If the people, patience can only mean that they are to starve and die a little more, and by God's blessing they may then be as badly off as they used to be.

MISS PEARSON.

TO THE TATLER.

SIR,—I beg to correct a statement of your periodical, respecting the unmanly attack that was made on Miss Pearson last Friday. You say it was caused by some indiscreet friend of hers, applauding before hand:—Sir, I was present, and immediately she rose to sing, I heard a hiss: it came from No. 21 Box dress circle—after that, followed the applause, but the hiss, before she sung a note, was unmanly and cowardly, to say the least of it.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

A LOVER OF TRUTH AND JUSTICE.

[What led us to conclude that the clapping came from some indiscreet friend (in addition to our not hearing the hiss) was, that we had noticed an applause of precisely the same sort on a former occasion. It is unpleasant, under any circumstances, to hear a hiss directed against a female; and a hiss, before she opens her mouth, would certainly seem to imply either a private enemy, or a critic in a very superfluous state of indignation. We hope however that in the end the young lady will not be the worse for it, and that she will feel herself called upon either to put more of her sensibility into her performances, or not to carry herself with that sort of air upon the stage, which probably arises from youth and inexperience, perhaps even from the simplicity of candour, but which many people take for a degree of confidence unwarranted by the amount of ability.]

IN WHAT SENSE THE KING NEVER DIES.—It has been said that, constitutionally, "the King never dies," and that "the King can do no wrong." On such forms of expression, the following passage from the Treatise on Government, by Algernon Sidney, furnishes an admirable commentary:—'The names of Kings are used in treaties when they are either children, or otherwise incapable of knowing what alliances are fit to be made or rejected; and yet such treaties do equally oblige them, their successors, and people, as if they were of mature age and fit for government. No man, therefore, ought to think it strange, if the King's name be used in domestic affairs, of which he neither ought nor can take any cognizance. In those cases, he is perpetually a minor; he must suffer the law to take its due course; and the judges, though nominated by him, are obliged by oath not to have any regard to his letters or personal demands. If a man be sued, he must appear; and a delinquent is to be tried coram lege, but no otherwise than secundum legem terræ, according to the law of the land, not the King's personal will and opinion. And the judgment given must be executed, whether they please him or not, it being always understood that he can speak no otherwise than the law speaks, and is always present as far as the law requires. For this reason, a noble lord who was irregularly detained in prison in 1621, being by Habeas Corpus brought to the bar of the King's Bench, where he sued to be released upon bail, and an ignorant judge telling him he must apply himself to the king, he replied, that he came thither for that end; that the king might eat, drink, or sleep where he pleased, but when he rendered justice he was always in that place. The king that renders justice is indeed always there: he never sleeps; he is subject to no infirmity; he never dies, unless the nation be extinguished, or so dissipated as to have no Government. No nation that has a sovereign power within itself does ever want this king. He was in Athens and Rome, as well as Babylon and Susa; and is as properly said to be now in Venice, Switzerland, or Holland, as in France, Morocco, or Turkey. This is he to whom we all owe a simple and unconditional obedience. This is he who never does any wrong; it is before him we appear when we demand justice, or render an account of our actions. All juries give their verdict in his sight: they are his commands that the judges are bound and sworn to obey, when they are not at all to consider such as they receive from the person that wears the crown.—Gorton's Topographical Dictionary.

OLYMPIC THEATRE.

IF the new little piece here last night, called My Grand Aunt, or Where there's a Will——, had been richly acted; we mean, if the performers had been able to give the due portion of comic garnish to the points furnished them by the author, we think it would have had an effect resembling those of the little comedies of the GARRICK and FOOTE school. It was not badly performed either, considering the humble pretensions of most of the company at this house; and the curtain fell amidst considerable applause. We know not who the writer is. The plot is simple and pleasant. Mrs Headley (Mrs EDWIN) an old maiden lady of sixty, has a number of middle-aged cousins, nieces, and nephews, the Crawleys, and the Leeches, and the Glossovers, who expect to profit by her will testamentary, but like most persons who deserve those allegorical appellations, have secretly a good deal of will of their own, rascally. Among their other speculations, the Crawleys wish to marry their daughter to the son and heir of the Leeches, who does not deserve her, the poor girl's affections being at the same time fixed upon a young Mr Welford, who is deserving but not rich. Some perplexity is produced in consequence on all sides; the old lady taking part with the young lady, and sending for young Welford to come and speak to her. At this juncture, Mr Lionel Glossover (Mr FREDERICKS) thinks he might as well settle the matter himself, by marrying his venerable cousin, and so becoming the dictator of the family. He accordingly makes love; is well received; and immediately begins lording it about him, calling the family together to meet the old lady and young Welford, and insisting with the most violent politeness that they shall all be seated. At length the whole party are assembled, the old lady in the middle; and she begins to tell them how she concedes the point of the young lady's marriage,—how, at the same time, she thinks it but just that she should indulge her own wishes while consulting theirs,—and argal, how she has thought fit to choose a friendly partner for her declining years, to whom, of course, it would be but fitting that she should leave the whole of her property. The consternation may be conceived. The old lady is here seized with a fit of bashfulness, and begs Mr Lionel to tell the remainder. Mr Lionel accordingly hums, and haws, and graciously seconds the motion in due style, concluding with informing them that the happy man is himself. There, however, the old gentlewoman says he is mistaken. Mr Lionel's consternation is added to that of the others. Who then can the happy man be? It is the boy that is standing beside her,—young Mr Welford. Mr LIONEL, among the airs he had given himself, had asked one of the cousins how he felt, and another if she would not "take a glass of water," &c.: so they now all come about him, and ask him how he feels, and whether he will not take a glass of water; and moreover, they request that he will be seated. He dashes out of the room. The old lady, having enjoyed the distress a little while, then calls her niece to her, gives her to understand that although there is a husband in the case, and that the property will be his, and young Welford be the husband, yet the husband was intended, not for herself, but for her "little good girl;" and so joining the hands of the young couple, the piece concludes.

In saying that this little production resembles the petite comedies of the last century, we do not mean to compare it to the best of them. It has not got their rich humour, and compact, sparkling dialogue. But it appears to us to be not unlike them in a certain air of nature and good sense; in the rejection of the superfluous, and even the possession of quiet and sly dramatic points, or hits of situation. The shrewdness and hearty humour of the old lady are well conceived; and we like the judicious names of the Crawleys and Leeches, which are at once characteristic and common.

The performers took pains, and deserve to be praised; though we could not help thinking what an effect the MATTOCKSES, ROBERT PALMERS, and others would have produced, with a dash of BANNISTER and SUETT among the rest. Mrs EDWIN is a useful and attentive actress, but she is hard and wants humour. She also mistakes a nice articulation and a vehement tone, for judgment and fervour. Indeed, this mistake is the characteristic of her whole style of acting. Mr FREDERICKS did very well in the passage where he politely forces the people into their seats: and Mrs KNIGHT, Mr COOPER, and the others, were more than respectable in the same scene; but the whole performance wants enriching.

The KING and QUEEN went to Covent Garden last night, to hear Miss INVERARITY; but as the Royal visits to the theatre are, luckily, nothing new, and His Majesty's popularity and certainty of receiving applause, are equally well known, we did not think ourselves called upon to forego a novelty at another house.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 9, 1831.

TO ADVERTISERS.

On Monday the 14th inst. The Tatler will begin to admit Advertisements, but under such an arrangement of its letter-press as will take nothing from the reader.

This opportunity may be particularly worthy the attention of those who deal in commodities conducive in any way to the Graces of Life, whether intellectual or external, such as Books, Music, Paintings, Engravings, Sculpture, Apparel, Jewellery, or any kind of Fancy Article; in short, anything connected with habits of elegance and refinement.

The space of The Tatler devoted to this purpose will be of necessity a great deal smaller than in other Daily Papers, so that every Advertisement will be sure of being seen; and Advertisers will bear in mind, that as the readers of the paper consist of Play-goers, Men of Leisure, Actors and Actresses, Accomplished Women in general, the Lovers of Books, Music, &c., and other cultivators of social intercourse and amusement, they form the very description of persons who are the most likely to repay the use made of its columns.

Advertisements received at the Tatler Office, 4 Catherine street, Strand; also by Mr G. Reynell, Country Newspaper and General Advertising Office, 42 Chancery lane; and by Messrs C. and W. Reynell, at the Printing Office, 45 Broad street, Golden square.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

The Annual Retrospect of Public Affairs, for 1831. In Two Volumes. Volume the First. 12mo. pp. 320. (Third Vol. of Dr Lardner's Cabinet Library.) Longman.

We thought we had done with this volume; but we return to it once more, to give its character of Lafayette, and to notice a remark or two respecting that admirable person, and the late revolution.

'It was lucky for the public tranquillity,' says the writer, 'that among the persons now ready to take the lead, there was a man like Lafayette, who enjoyed the full confidence of the victorious party,—whose name had been known to the people for upwards of forty years, as their warm and consistent friend; whose reputation had been identified with the national glory; and who already represented in his person two revolutions, in the new and old world.

'The popularity of the venerable chief was great and undisputed. Generous, affable, and kind-hearted in private life, adored by a patriarchal family of three generations, he enjoyed a national reputation as a patriot and lover of freedom, which had been accumulating without a drawback for fifty years. As an ardent champion for liberty and national independence, he drew his youthful sword in the cause of America, and shared the friendship as well as the toils and renown of Washington. The principles for which he then fought, were afterwards his guides in all situations of life, and amid all vicissitudes of fortune. This invariable consistency and entire devotion to the popular cause, constituted the charm of his character, and gave him an influence over the minds of his countrymen, which neither his rank, his abilities, nor his services could have commanded. Exiled from France as the enemy of liberty, because he was the friend of order, and arrested in Austria as the enemy of order because he was the friend of liberty, he continued equally faithful to his principles in the prison of Olmutz, as in the command of the National Guard of France. At the head of the first revolution as long as it was unstained with atrocities, he never deserted its principles in their disgrace; having the good fortune to escape the honours of the empire, and to incur the hatred of the restoration, he brought an unsullied glory and long-tried virtue to strengthen and direct the second. General Gerard and some of the other permanent deputies were likewise objects of public confidence, as being always opposed to the court. The General took the command of the regular troops. Lafayette, who had been the founder of the National Guard in 1789, and who was always looked upon as their father, was now invested with the command in chief of this effective instrument of national security and public order, and repaired to the Hotel de Ville, at the head of a great body of guards, and surrounded by an immense assemblage of citizens in a high state of excitement and enthusiasm.

'From this place he issued animated proclamations for encouraging the people, regulating the service, and organizing the formation of the civic militia, to whom the protection of life, property, and liberty, was now exclusively intrusted. Sentinels and patrols from this force were sent to all quarters of the capital. Towards the evening a deputation from St Cloud arrived at the Hotel de Ville to propose an accommodation, on the conditions of forming a liberal ministry and rescinding the ordinances. But, as Marmont had predicted, it came too late. New rights had been created by victory. The sovereignty of the people was now triumphant over the sovereignty of the throne. The Hotel de Ville was more powerful than the Tuilleries; and the municipality of Paris, instead of acknowledging a portfolio, had a crown to give away. No reliance could be placed on the faith of a man who had already broken his oath, or the mercy of a prince who had swept the streets of his capital with grape-shot;—and Charles X had ceased to reign.' —P. 231.

The deputies were then got together, and the crown on the 7th of August, was given to the Duke of Orleans. A republic, however, had been wished for by many:—

'Assemblages of republicans, consisting of students from the different schools, who had fought during the revolution; and the leaders of different popular associations, had collected round the chamber on the 6th, and had excited some alarm among its members. Addressing themselves to the deputies as they passed, they declared, that in not deciding for a republic they were betraying the cause of those who had driven away the Bourbons. General Lafayette and another popular deputy, M. B. Constant, harangued them on their illegal proceedings, and requested them to disperse quietly, with some effect; but did not entirely obtain their object. After the sitting was over, they proceeded to the amount of several hundreds, to the place de Louis XV, in a tumultuous manner, and threatened to engage greater bodies of the students, and to procure a reinforcement of armed citizens from the fauxbourgs on the following day, to compel the Chamber of Deputies to do its duty. It was suspected by some that General Lafayette had not been so zealous as he ought to have been in exerting his influence to put down this political mob, and that he would not have been displeased to hear the word President of a Republic attached to his name. In this case, the government could not have stood a month, and all Europe would have taken the alarm at the prospect of anarchy in France. In such critical circumstances, M. Delessert, and several friends of the venerable republican, waited upon him and his son, M. George Lafayette, to press them to more active interference, on a threat, that if the assemblage again collected it must be dispersed by an armed force. This menace had its effect for the time. Delegates were sent round to the clubs and the schools to countermand the meeting; and the deputies were allowed to vote the charter, and to dispose of the crown without molestation or tumult.'—P. 255.

We differ with two points in this account of Lafayette and the Revolution,—first in the distinction drawn between his ability and his virtue; and second, with the assertion that a republican government would not have lasted a month. The author, by the way, repeats the saying attributed to Lafayette, that the new monarchy, with the Duke of Orleans at the head of it, was the "best of republics." We have seen the authenticity of this saying denied. We know not what it is possible for the General to have said in a moment of transport at the exit of Charles X; nor do we forget, that although he gave up and has never since resumed his title of Marquis, he stood by the first constitutional monarchy, as well as advocated the second. But we doubt whether he could think any monarchy which retains the means of corruption, the "best of republics,"—unless, indeed, he expected it shortly to become a different thing than it turned out. Perhaps he did; for he has gone out himself, dissatisfied with it. To return, however, to our two points; we think it is high time for the world no longer to be under the delusion of making those distinctions between ability and a commanding height of virtue, which are so flattering to men of a second-rate order, and which have done so much harm, by leading people to suppose great goodness and great discernment incompatible. Ability (or what is so called), though found often among men not of the highest virtue, is sure in the end to lose, in direct proportion to its want of goodness, whether the loss occur in a public shape or private. In private, the man gets a seared heart, and loses his comfort: in public he loses or injures some great cause. Now we hold that an extreme condition of moral excellence and consistency like Lafayette's (we do not speak in the canting, but in the philosophic sense) is of necessity accompanied with the very highest kind of discernment. It is itself a proof of it; or it is the instinct of the discernment, enabling the possessor to dispense with the usual ways of acquiring it. And we have no doubt whatsoever, that men, gifted to that degree, will always be found, by those capable of understanding them, gifted with the power of shewing the intellectual instinct which it implies; and able, when the occasion is worthy of them, to think and discourse in the very best and most convincing manner. Lafayette is remarkable, in the Chamber of Deputies, for the fineness of his sense, and the deep impression which it makes; nor does he want, when he thinks them necessary, the sententious tact of the orator, or the smartness of the humourist; as was shewn the other day, when he spoke so happily about "men who were furious with moderation." He gets up in the assembly, looks and speaks in his usual natural manner, and lets the wisdom of the truth that is in him take its course. Could a man of less goodness be so able a reasoner? Could a reasoner of less ability be so good a man? We think not; for then he would not be altogether the man he is, and governments would have abounded with Lafayettes, perfect in their character for honesty, and outlasting, in the consequences of it, the wisdom that is corrupted into cunning. What is the amount of these, and where is their success? What seed of intended and included good has their adversity sown? For this too is the privilege of what (for want of a word to express it) may be called agathosophy, or the identification of wisdom and goodness. The very non-success of an illustriously good man leaves a sting of sweetness in the hearts of his followers that is sure to produce good. Love incites doctrine; doctrine opinion; and opinion moves the world.

With regard to the republic which "would not have stood a month," we are convinced that it would have been triumphantly settled on the instant,—more triumphantly than the new monarchy, more to the astonishment (we grant) of the allied monarchies; but for that very reason more to their utter bafflement and non-resistance. It would have petrified them, in every sense of the word. Why should it not? It is the sense of right on the part of the French that has enabled them to maintain their position: and what right had they not to eject Bourbonism altogether, and set up the same form of government that the Anglo-Americans did? The right was indisputable. It would have been put to the allied courts in the calmness of conscious strength, and of the beautiful triumph of the Three Days; and not one would have dared to gainsay it. Whether the French themselves would have suffered it to last, is another question. We think they would; because the diffusion of knowledge, especially in France, has rendered the community wiser, and less inclined to mingle right with wrong; which is a fact the Tories of this country cannot discern, nor believe in, because their own pretended rights are mixed up so exceedingly with wrong. We are however not going to enter into any abstract question about monarchy and republics. We are content that the new state of things, gloriously opened upon the world, both in France and ENGLAND, should bring about WHATEVER IS BEST AND MOST REASONABLE,—which we feel certain the progress of knowledge must do. Our sole object at present was to express our difference of opinion with what appeared to us a very gratuitous assertion on the part of the author of the 'Retrospect.' We have our opinion as to other matters, but will not vent it at present, lest our motives should be mistaken by the honest of any party, especially by those of the party now ruling, who have raised themselves millions of miles in our respect, and whose measures we only wish we could advance with a millionth part of the force of our desire. We always thought that the present Chancellor would have carried a certain spirit of improvement and exaltation with him, wherever he went; but we confess we did not think Lord Grey capable of so noble a movement as this, even as a matter of policy. We own ourselves radical on the subject of reform, to the very tip of the root; and therefore we go farther than these measures; but not the less for that do we think them wise and delightful, and calculated to secure the ultimate good of all,—aye, even of the Tories, sua si bona norint,—if they did but know their own goods, and would not confound them with rotten boroughs.

PRECIOUS TEARS.—At the funeral of his Majesty, Louis the Eighteenth of France, the trappings of the horses belonging to the state carriage, were ornamented with bunches of silver tears.—Historical Traveller.

SIR THOMAS LAWRENCE.

TO THE TATLER.

DEAR MR TATLER,—Your criticisms on works of art are so just and so piquantes, that many of your readers regret their infrequency: but while I admit that your remarks on Sir Thomas Lawrence are not exceptions to them, being in the main no less true than severe, may I be permitted to hint, that, in spite of his sophistications of style, and his courtier-like treatment of nature, he had a feeling for grace and truth, which, though evidenced in meretricious modes, and almost neutralized by them, did nevertheless redeem, in a certain measure, the "showy and flimsy" quality of too many of his pictures? Let me recall to your recollection those two portraits of the Pope and Cardinal Gonsalvi, which, maugre the Lawrence-like expression of the faces, I think you must allow to be splendid works of art, and as such, worthy of a better fate than you predict for them. I may be allowed to assure you, dear Mr TATLER, that I lament the want of integrity in Lawrence's style, as much as you condemn it; that I think, with you, his drawing was merely neat and clever, by virtue of mechanical skill and practice, and that its very gracefulness was artificial; but I must differ with you in thinking that that accomplishment had any share in "spoiling" him; for I conceive that in him the man spoilt the artist, and the sycophantic character the beautiful style. I cannot help thinking, that not only Lawrence was great as an artist, by virtue of his feeling for nature,—of his fine sense of the merely beautiful,—his nice perception of eye and his ready skill of hand,—but that without the first qualification, which I contend he possessed, the latter would have been quite insufficient to enable him to evince those refinements of art which distinguished his best works. He threw mind into his art, though his portraits, as you justly observe "want soul." His mind, I grant, was "subdued to the quality" of his company, and his taste was sophisticated; but still, I would maintain the existence of his natural genius for art, though I cannot argue for its supremacy over the insincerities and false refinements of his style.—I have proved myself so poor an apologist, that, were it not that I feel with how much force a sweeping censure from you (who so rarely indulge in them) will act on the fame of Lawrence, in the minds of those whose opinions are of value in matters of taste, I should not trouble you with this attempt to modify the excommunication to which you have sentenced him.

Your admiring reader,

A LOVER OF ART.

[We suspect that our correspondent and ourselves are of one identical opinion on this point: only a severe mode of putting the case against Lawrence rouses his good-nature to take the favourable side, while an over-estimation of the President's merits provoked us into that kind of sweeping censure which, we are well pleased to be told, is not usual with us. We cannot help thinking, that in the very best of Lawrence's works there is a certain air of conscious fragility, such as might be supposed to be instinctive in himself, and which, with a varnish of aristocratical self-possession over it, was the prevailing expression he found among his fashionable sitters. They were "of the porcelain clay of the earth," not in Shakspeare's sense, but in the sense of the china-shops,—fine, weak, costly, stationary, not to be touched. He could not have painted a man of marble, like Napoleon, or the intellectual sovereignty of such heads as you see in Titian. They would have put him out, like the presences of the Gods. What was too great for a master of the ceremonies, would have been too great for Lawrence. In short, we look upon him as a tip-top, courtly, fashionable, fugitive painter, not without great cleverness, or a perception of grace and truth certainly, but as certainly without such a perception of them as helped him to get out of the modes by which they are disfigured; otherwise how could he have looked on their divine countenances, and told the lies that his painting did? Must we confess, at the same time, that we never saw his portraits of the Pope and the Cardinal? We must, for it is true. We have seen his paintings only in separate collections; and know nothing of the portrait of Pius VII. except through the medium of the engraving.]

MAN NEVER WHOLLY DEVOID OF HUMANITY.—We have scarcely an instance on the records of cruelty and crime, of a man's wholly divesting himself of the feelings of humanity; we always find some corner, however confined, in which affection is deposited, and even Nero left friends who wept his fall, and strewed his grave with flowers.—Mac Farlane's Constantinople.

MOTHER CAREY'S CHICKENS.—Why were petrels, in past times, thought to predict a storm?—Because they seem to repose in a common breeze, but, upon the approach, or during the continuation, of a gale, they surround a ship, and catch up the small animals which the agitated ocean brings near the surface, or any food that may be dropped from the vessel. Whisking like an arrow through the deep valleys of the abyss, and darting away over the foaming crest of some mountain wave, they attend the labouring bark in all her perilous course. When the storm subsides, they retire to rest, and are no more seen. Our sailors have, from very early times, called these birds "Mother Carey's chickens."—Knapp—Knowledge for the People, Part IV.

QUEEN'S THEATRE.

THE exertions of this neat little theatre do it great credit. If any body wishes to see how far twirling will go, he should see the divertissement that was brought out here last night. It was so extraordinary that we are not sorry to be obliged to see it again, in consequence of the absence of one of the three new French dancers announced,—to wit, the male dancer, who was unable to appear, on account of an accident. The other two had the debut themselves; so that the story, we presume, was given up, for we saw none. We beheld only an exhibition of rival skill, with the corps de ballet in attendance. Both the ladies are young, with pleasanter and more earnest countenances than the major part of their sisterhood; and both are very active and skilful. The house is so small, that you see them almost as in a room; and the fervour of their seriousness, united with that of their action,—(to say nothing of the size of leg common to those who "thump the verdant floor,")—had sometimes almost a formidable aspect, as they came pitchiug themselves from the back of the stage, and looking in your face.

To judge from a first appearance (which does not always furnish complete ground for decision) we should say, that one of the dancers excels the other in attitude; while the other surpasses her to a far greater degree in making a tee-to-tum of herself, and twirling in a most interminable manner,—all however with sufficient grace. When you expect her to leave off, she seems to begin afresh; and this impression she will repeat; so that it would appear that she might continue for ever, if she chose. And at the termination she walks apart, as tranquil and steady as if nothing had happened. The dancers in GOLDSMITH,

'——— Who simply sought renown,
By holding out to tire each other down,' would have stood no chance with her. We have seen a great long room full of dancing peasants in Italy, waltzing all at once upon that principle, and getting every moment more staring, serious, and red. They would have envied the supremacy of her conclusions, and the eternity of her recurrence.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

SECOND CONCERT, MONDAY, MARCH 7, 1831.

ACT I.

Overture, Faust	Spohr.
Scena, Signor LABLACHE, "Che sento" (Faust)
Quartetto, (No 4) two Violins, Viola, and Violoncello, Messrs TOLBEQUE, GRIESBACH, MORALT, and LINDLEY.	Beethoven.
Duetto, Mrs WOOD (late Miss PATON) and Signor LABLACHE, "Bella imago" (Semiramide)	Rossini.
Sinfonia in D.	Beethoven.

ACT II.

Sinfonia (Jupiter)	Mozart.
Recit. ed Aria, Mrs WOOD, "Mi tradì" (Il Don Giovanni)	Mozart.
Notturno, two Oboes, two Clarinetts, two Bassoons, and two Horns, Messrs G. COOKE, G. IRWIN, WILLMAN, POWELL, MACKINTOSH, TULLY, PLATT, and RAE	Mozart.
Duetto, Mr BENNETT and Signor LABLACHE, "Parlar, spiegar" (Pietro l'Eremita)	Rossini.
Overture, Egmont	Beethoven.

Leader, Mr MORI,—Conductor, Mr BISHOP.

The scheme of the second concert of the present season, though good in the main, was not so worthy of the Philharmonic Society as the first. Although it is probable that the Directors are desirous of accommodating their selections to the conflicting tastes of the subscribers, they ought notwithstanding to bear in mind the principle upon which the Society was instituted—that of having the best compositions performed, as they are, and can be performed no where else. They should also never forget their "pride of place," and that it is expected at their hands not merely to fill their subscription every year, but to be an unerring authority in questions of sound taste; to be the leaders, and not the servants of second and third-rate minds; but gradually to draw these to a knowledge of the true faith. Much has been done of late years, and they may yet do more, both for good music, and their own reputation. There were three or four people, it is true, who during the last performance expressed some impatience at the septett of HUMMELL, and the double quartett of SPOHR; but only observe the attention such persons pay to the general performance, and their approbation or disapprobation becomes a matter of perfect indifference. It is only to be regretted that they should have excluded others who would have appreciated those beautiful compositions. An admirer of poetry who can perceive no loveliness in the Fairy Queen or the Faithful Shepherdess; and the lover of music who cannot feel the genius of SPOHR and of HUMMELL, are, according to our apprehension, in a similar predicament. The former of these composers is perhaps the most independent and fine thinker of any musician of the present day. His ideas are all bold and upon a grand scale: the construction of his harmonies are never common-place. He puts down what he feels, without reference to the judgment or decision of inferior minds. His own thoughts occupy him when he writes, and not what the thoughts of the million will be as to the result. He is sure of the support of kindred minds, and that is enough for him. When MOZART was writing the Requiem, he never reflected for a moment what such critics as Mr PARKE the oboe-player would think of the performance; and if he had, he would not have altered a note, unless it were for the better.

The overture to the opera of Faust which opened the performance of this evening is a noble composition, daring and grand, with a mixture of sweetness and dark mystery aptly in character with the subject of which it is the prologue. The slow movement succeeding the first, for solemnity of thought, and for the boldness and originality of the harmonies, is in our estimation worthy of any musician. The scena which succeeded the overture, sung by Signor LABLACHE, was not to our taste the most happily selected, either for the reputation of the opera, or the peculiar powers of the singer. The fine solo in four sharps, by Mephistophiles, "Va Sbramando," with its turbulent and fiery accompaniment, would have better suited all the parties. Signor LABLACHE however is not heard to the best advantage in a concert-room; he is essentially a dramatic singer, and though a very fine and correct one, he appears to be in trammels when not in action. And then the portentous exorbitance of his voice, and which he cannot restrain within due bounds for three bars successively, without its bursting forth with the explosions of a volcano, render his exhibitions in the penfold of a concert-room amusing. In the duet with Mrs WOOD, his magnificence descended to her level—at times: as for poor little Mr BENNETT, he could have eaten him with a pin and a corn of salt. "Our fat friend" must learn English, and study the accommodating character of Professor Bottom, who could roar you both the lion and the sucking dove. As we have alluded to the singers, it may as well be mentioned at the same time that Mrs WOOD, who was properly, that is to say, handsomely greeted, sang the recitative from the Don Giovanni excellently: her expression of the words, "Perchè questi sospiri," was pathetic and delicate: in the beautiful air, "Mi tradì," which followed, we thought her not so effective—perhaps by comparison;—it is difficult, and she might not be sufficiently self-possessed to give to it all the requisite expression. The quality of Mr BENNETT'S voice is agreeable; its falsetto not so, and he is liable to sing out of tune; at least he was too flat almost all through the duet of this evening. The two pieces selected from ROSSINI are in serious operas. From their flippant character, no mortal would have guessed this. He is the Genius of triplet, bustle, and tappage.

The quartett from BEETHOVEN was well performed. Mr TOLBEQUE, who played the first violin, exhibits good promise, but he has evidently come forward too early; he wants power, and his upper notes are frequently faulty. He will produce a different impression after two years more of constant and close practice.

The symphony in D by BEETHOVEN was his second of this class of composition. It is both rational and symmetrical. The andante is a most charming melody; the scherzo, original and admirably treated; and the finale perhaps the most original of the whole. It was finely played.

As for the Jupiter symphony, criticism has been exhausted upon that wonderful work. Suffice it to say, that we envy SALOMON the thought of stamping that title upon it; and that (albeit being thorough MILTONIANS) we should hesitate upon the choice of being the authors of such a production, or the Comus.

With the exception of Mr WILLMAN, the other performers executed the Notturno but indifferently. They were unsteady, out of tune, and apparently nervous.

The fine overture to Egmont closed the performance of the evening.

C.

THE KINGFISHER.— Why is the term halcyon used figuratively for quiet?—Because the halcyon or kingfisher was feigned by the poets to breed in the sea, and that there was always a calm during her incubation.

As firm as the rock, and as calm as the flood,
Where the peace-loving halcyon deposits her brood.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

THURSDAY, MARCH 10, 1831.

TO ADVERTISERS.

On Monday the 14th inst. The Tatler will begin to admit Advertisements, but under such an arrangement of its letter-press as will take nothing from the reader.

This opportunity may be particularly worthy the attention of those who deal in commodities conducive in any way to the Graces of Life, whether intellectual or external, such as Books, Music, Paintings, Engravings, Sculpture, Apparel, Jewellery, or any kind of Fancy Article; in short, anything connected with habits of elegance and refinement.

The space of The Tatler devoted to this purpose will be of necessity a great deal smaller than in other Daily Papers, so that every Advertisement will be sure of being seen; and Advertisers will bear in mind, that as the readers of the paper consist of Play-goers, Men of Leisure, Actors and Actresses, Accomplished Women in general, the Lovers of Books, Music, &c., and other cultivators of social intercourse and amusement, they form the very description of persons who are the most likely to repay the use made of its columns.

Advertisements received at the Tatler Office, 4 Catherine street, Strand; also by Mr G. Reynell, Country Newspaper and General Advertising Office, 42 Chancery lane; and by Messrs C. and W. Reynell, at the Printing Office, 45 Broad street, Golden square.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

The History of Maritime and Inland Discovery. Vol. III. 12mo. (Sixteenth Volume of Dr Lardner's Cabinet Cyclopædia.) Longman.

This volume contains sketches of the modern voyages in the new hemisphere, including those of Cook and Perouse, up to Ross, Parry, and Humboldt, and the Journeys of Captain Franklin, Head, &c.; accounts of modern Eastern adventure, including the interesting acquaintance made with Japan by Golownin, and the travels of Webb, Raper, and Fraser in the Himalayah Mountains; and finally, the African explorations of Bruce, of Park, and Denham and Clapperton. This is much for 362 pages. It would be too much, were it not an historical summary; which is a characteristic the reader must bear in mind. The accounts however (from the glance we have given to the work) appear to be singularly scrupulous and comprehensive for so rapid a survey. The lesser points are not forgotten, and the main ones are properly dwelt upon. We only miss a point of importance in Cook's last voyage, which we shall notice presently, and Humboldt's beautiful account of those myriads of lights in the air which he saw on one occasion in South America. We have his account of the cavern of nocturnal birds, and the ghastly fight between the electric eels and the horses; and Bruce's cow is not forgotten: with a good judgment upon it and upon the traveller himself. We have almost been tempted to insert the well-known, but always interesting account of the death of Captain Cook: but abstain, for fear of making our readers rise upon us with all their books in their hands. However, we may give the summary of the merits of that celebrated navigator, and what he did for the world. This is not so old; and it has brought another work to our recollection, from which we shall extract some passages which we look upon as golden ones, and which nevertheless are very likely not to have been dug out of it by reviewers in general.

'"In order," says the history, "to estimate the merits of Capt. Cook, it will be only necessary to survey generally the extent and nature of his discoveries, and to examine what influence they exerted immediately on the commercial enterprise of nations. In the extent of the coasts which he surveyed or discovered, he far surpasses every other navigator. The Eastern coast of New Holland, 2,000 miles in extent, was totally unknown till he traced it; escaping from the dangers of that intricate navigation solely by his cool intrepidity, and the resources of his skill. He also circumnavigated New Zealand, the eastern and southern parts of which were quite unknown, and supposed by many to be united to the Terra Australis Incognita. New Caledonia and Norfolk Island were both discovered by him; and the New Hebrides, from his labours first assumed a definite shape in our maps. He rendered an essential service to geography also by his circumnavigating the globe in a high southern latitude; for, though the exertions and dangers of that difficult navigation were not repaid by any brilliant discoveries, it set at rest a question which had for ages divided the opinions of speculative geographers. Sandwich Island or Southern Thule, may be numbered among his discoveries, although it is probably the land which Gerritz had descried a century before.

'His discoveries on the north-west coast of America were still more important and more extensive. In one voyage he effected more than the Spanish navigators had been able to accomplish in the course of two centuries. In sailing through Behring's Strait, he determined the proximity of Asia and America, which Behring himself had failed to perceive; and he assigned the coast of the Tshuktzki to its true place; which, in many maps of his time, was placed some degrees too far to the westward.

'It is needless to recapitulate here the large additions which are made to our knowledge of the groups of islands scattered through the Pacific Ocean. Some of the Society and Friendly Islands were known before his time; but he carefully surveyed those Archipelagoes and fixed the positions of the chief islands, such as Otaheite and Tongataboo, with an accuracy equal to that of an European observatory. He prided himself especially on having discovered the Sandwich Islands; and there is no good reason to refuse him that honour, for, if even it be true that a Spanish navigator, named Gali, discovered those islands in 1576, and that he gave to Owhyhee the name of Mesa or Table Mountain, which is marked in old Spanish charts twenty-two degrees to the west of the Sandwich Islands, but in the same latitude with them; yet no stress can be laid on a discovery from which mankind derived no knowledge. The Spaniards seem soon to have totally forgotten the Sandwich Islands, if they ever knew them, notwithstanding the advantages which they might have derived from those islands in their frequent voyages from New Spain to Manilla. Anson and many other navigators might have been spared infinite distress and suffering in their voyages across the Pacific, had anything certain been known of the existence and situation of the Sandwich Islands.

'But Cook's merit is not more conspicuous in the extent of his discoveries, than in the correctness with which he laid down the position of every coast of which he caught a glimpse. His surveys afford the materials of accurate geography. He adopted in practice every improvement suggested by the progress of science; and, instead of committing errors amounting to two or three degrees of longitude, like most of his predecessors, his determinations were such as to be considered accurate even at the present day; nor was this the merit of the astronomers who accompanied him on his expeditions. He was himself a skilful observer, and at the same time so vigilant and indefatigable, that no opportunity ever escaped him of ascertaining his true place. He possessed in an eminent degree the sagacity peculiar to seamen, and in his conjectures respecting the configurations of coasts he very rarely erred. La Perouse, who was a highly-accomplished seaman, always mentions the name of Cook with the warmest admiration, and frequently alludes to the remarkable correctness of his surveys. Crozet also, who wrote the narrative of Marion's voyage, speaking of Cook's survey of the shores of New Zealand, says,—"That its exactness and minuteness of detail astonished him beyond expression;" but Cook's skill as a marine surveyor may be still better estimated from the chart which, at the commencement of his career, he constructed of the coasts of Newfoundland; and of that chart, Captain Frederick Bullock, the able officer who has recently completed the survey of Newfoundland, speaks in those terms of warm commendation, which a man of ability naturally bestows on whatever is excellent.

'From the second expedition of Cook may be dated the art of preserving the health of the seamen in long voyages: before that time, navigators who crossed the Pacific, hurried precipitately by the shortest course to the Ladrones, or the Philippine Islands; and yet they rarely reached home without the loss of a large proportion of their crew. Cook, on the other hand, felt himself perfectly at home on the ocean; he did not care to limit his voyages, either in space of time or of distance; he sailed through every climate, crossing both the arctic and antarctic circles; and proved that a voyage of four years' duration does not necessarily affect the health of seamen. This was a discovery of far greater importance than that of a new continent could have been: by his banishing the terror that arose from the frightful mortality that previously attended on long voyages, he has mainly contributed to the boldness of navigation which distinguishes the present day.

'Among the immediate effects of Captain Cook's voyages, the most important was the establishment of a colony at Botany Bay. That great navigator seems to have contracted a partiality towards the New Zealanders; he admired their generosity, their manly courage, and their intelligence. Their country appeared to him fertile, abounding with commodities which might become valuable in commerce; and he hints, though with diffidence, to the possibility of a trade being carried on between Europe and New Zealand. His observations on this subject had influence, no doubt, on the minds of the English Ministers, and they resolved on establishing a colony at New Holland; and the result has justified Cook's sanguine anticipations. The fur-trade also, which soon caused such a concourse of European shipping in the Pacific ocean, originated in his third voyage; but his familiarity with the South Sea islanders, the trade which he established with them, and the practice which he commenced of purchasing sea-stores from them, have had, perhaps, a stronger influence on navigation in the Pacific.

'Finally, to complete the eulogium on this great navigator, it will be sufficient to enumerate some of the distinguished seamen who served under him, such as Vancouver, Broughton, Bligh, Burney, Colmet, Portlock, Dixon, &c.; these men learned under Cook the arduous duties of their profession, and they always spoke of him with unqualified admiration and respect.'—P. 89.

What a pity that a man like this should have fallen a victim to his attempt at practising a deception; for that such was the case there is no doubt. Our author speaks of the attempt to "entrap" the King of Owyhee. Ledyard, a man of exalted veracity, has settled that point. We regret that the author has not availed himself of the pages of that excellent person, to add another cause to the exasperation of the natives; for the trick was not all; nor was it the only circumstance with which trick had mingled. Cook, from long habits of command and success, and partly, no doubt, from that kind of self-dependence for which in general he had so much reason, but which is apt to lead a self-educated man into a dangerous confusion of his will with his right, had, in visiting the fatal bay just before, seized upon a fence round a consecrated spot of ground, for wood. He offered indeed hatchets in exchange for it; but the chiefs were afraid to accept even that tempting bait in return for what they conceived a profanation. 'It was a very unequal price,' says Ledyard (who was with him) 'if the honest chiefs would have accepted of the bribe; and Cook offered it only to evade the imputation of taking their property without payment. The chiefs again refused it. Cook then added another hatchet, and kindling into resentment, told them to take it or nothing. Kikinny, to whom the offer was made, turned pale, and trembled as he stood, but still refused. Cook thrust them into his garment that was folded round him, and left him immediately, to hasten the execution. As for Kikinny, he turned to some of his menials, and made them take the hatchets out of his garment, not touching them himself. By this time, a considerable concourse of the natives had assembled under the walls of the Morai, where we were throwing the wood down, and were very outrageous, and even threw the wood and images back as we threw them down; and I cannot think what prevented them from proceeding to greater lengths; however, it so happened, that we got the whole into the boats, and safely on board.'—P. 136.

'This story,' says Mr Jared Sparks, in his Life of Ledyard (which is the book we spoke of above) 'is told differently by Captain King, who wrote that part of Cook's Third Voyage, which relates to the Sandwich Islands. As he represents it, no objection was made to the proposal for taking away the enclosure of wood that surrounded the Morai, and even the images were tumbled down and carried off, under the eyes of the priests, without any resistance or disapprobation on their parts. This would seem improbable. The Morai was the depositary of the dead, a place where the images of the gods were kept, and solemn ceremonies performed. It is not easy to reconcile the two accounts; but Ledyard was employed with others in removing the fence, and he manifestly describes what he saw. He might not have been so well acquainted with the manner and conditions of the purchase as Captain King; yet in the detail of occurrences in which he was engaged, and their effects on the people around him, it is hardly possible that he should have been mistaken.'—Life of Ledyard, p. 137.

Of the attempt to entrap the King, Ledyard says, 'On the 13th, at night, the Discovery's large cutter, which was at her usual mooring at the bower buoy, was taken away. On the 14th, the Captains met to consult what should be done on this alarming occasion; and the issue of their opinions was, that one of the two Captains should land with armed boats and a guard of marines, and attempt to persuade Teraiobu, who was then at his house in that town, to come on board upon a visit; and that, when he was on board, he should be kept prisoner until his subjects should release him by a restitution of the cutter."—P. 143.

The attempt failed, and circumstances ensued which ended in the death of the illustrious navigator. We cannot resist this opportunity of repeating Ledyard's account of the heroical behaviour of a gentleman, whom we have had the honour of seeing and conversing with. It is, Colonel, then Mr Phillips, Cook's Lieutenant of Marines, who was with him when he died:—

'Cook and Mr Phillips were together a few paces in the rear of the guard, and perceiving a general fire without orders, quitted Teraiobu, and ran to the shore to put a stop to it; but not being able to make themselves heard, and being close pressed upon by the chiefs, they joined the guard, who fired as they retreated. Cook, having at length reached the margin of the water, between the fire of the boats, waved with his hat for them to cease firing and come in; and while he was doing this, a chief from behind stabbed him with one of our iron daggers, just under the shoulder blade, and it passed quite through his body. Cook fell with his face in the water, and immediately expired. Mr Phillips, not being able any longer to use his fusee, drew his sword, and engaging the chief whom he saw kill Cook, soon despatched him. His guard in the meantime were all killed but two, and they had plunged into the water, and were swimming to the boats. He stood thus for some time, the butt of all their force, and being as complete in the use of his sword as he was accomplished, his noble achievements struck the barbarians with awe; but being wounded, and growing faint from loss of blood and excess of action, he plunged into the sea with his sword in his hand, and swam to the boats; where, however, he was scarcely taken on board, before somebody saw one of the marines that had swam from the shore, lying flat upon the bottom. Phillips, hearing this, ran aft, threw himself in after him, and brought him up with him to the surface of the water, and both were taken in.'—P. 148.

The Lieutenant's wound was "not dangerous, though very bad." Ledyard was on shore at the moment, a corporal under him. Perhaps nobody guessed what an extraordinary man they had with them, in the person of that corporal.

We have the pleasure of remembering Colonel Phillips well. We met him at C. L.'s with his old friend and messmate Captain (late Admiral) Burney. He was a fine, hale, florid, good-humoured old gentleman, with a face full of heartiness; and we trust is alive, and will pardon this mention of him.

We are obliged to leave off without making those quotations from Ledyard to which we alluded in the beginning of our article, but though the book containing them was published three or four years since, we cannot resist the opportunity of indulging ourselves, and we believe the reader, with them; which we shall accordingly do to-morrow.

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

"The little and short sayings of wise and excellent men are of great value, like the dust of gold, or the least sparks of diamonds."—Tillotson.

The Mahometan Road to Eternal Bliss.—The stages to Heaven are thus divided by the prophet:—prayer carries a man half way; fasting the rest; but it is charity that gains him admittance to the society of the houris.—Mac Farlane's Constantinople.

— Insects have been known to stock ponds on hills with fish! The large water-beetle, which feeds upon the spawn of fish, occasionally, in the evening, climbs up the stems of rushes, &c. out of the water, so as to take wing: in these circumstances it has been caught, and, on being put into water, has been found to give out the spawn with which it had gorged itself previous to taking flight, both in a digested and undigested state; so that, on trial, it has been found to produce fish of various kinds.—Jameson.

Soame Jenyns.—A disagreement about a name or a date will mar the best story that was ever put together. Sir Joshua Reynolds luckily could not hear an interrupter of this sort; Johnson would not hear, or if he heard him, would not heed him; Soame Jenyns heard him, heeded him, set him right, and took up his tale, where he had left it, without any diminution of his humour; adding only a few more twists to his snuff box, a few more taps upon the lid of it, with a preparatory grunt or two, the invariable forerunner of the amenity that was at the heels of them. He was the man who bore his part in all societies with the most even temper and undisturbed hilarity of all the good companions whom I ever knew. He came into your house at the very moment you had put upon your card; he dressed himself to do your party honour in all the colours of the gay; his lace, indeed, had long since lost his lustre, but his coat had faithfully retained its cut since the days when gentlemen wore embroidered figured velvets, with short sleeves, boot cuffs and buckram skirts; as nature had cast him in the exact mould of an ill-made pair of stiff stays, he followed her so close in the fashion of his coat, that it was doubted if he did not wear them: because he had a protuberant wen just under his pole, he wore a wig that did not cover above half his head. His eyes were protruded like the eyes of a lobster, who wears them at the end of his feelers, and yet there was room between one of these and his nose for another wen, that added nothing to his beauty; yet I heard this good man very innocently remark, when Gibbon published his history, that he wondered any man so ugly could write a book. Such was the exterior of a man, who was the charm of the circle, and gave a zest to every company he came into.—Cumberland's Memoirs.

THE PLAY-GOER.

BY THE ORIGINAL THEATRICAL CRITIC IN THE EXAMINER.

PERFORMANCE OF LAST NIGHT.

COVENT GARDEN.—A Grand Miscellaneous Selection of Music.

COVENT GARDEN.

We heard nearly the whole first part of the Selection of Music last night; which, considering that it was not over till past nine, was quite enough. If we had stayed the other two parts, there was not much to hear in the way of selection, though most probably the modern music, of which they chiefly consisted, was well received. There were more ballads in the list, and productions of living composers, than usual.

Miss PATON was in fine voice last night. She seemed determined, by the strength and vehemence of her tones, to refute the notion of those who think that her power is diminished. We forgot to mention, in our last notice of these performances, that Miss PATON, who had become Mrs WOOD the day before, was in bridal white, with a wreath of roses in her hair. She was received with great cordiality. We were highly and agreeably struck with the simplicity of the announcement of the marriage in the newspapers,—"JOSEPH WOOD to MARY ANN PATON." This was neutralizing the whole matter of rank, and at the same time shewing the full force of the lady's name. "MARY ANN PATON" had a very good sound. The name implied the presence of an accomplishment, and the reputation of it. And "JOSEPH WOOD" had his claims also. The lady, we observe, is still called Miss PATON in the English bills. In those of the Italian Opera they call her Mrs WOOD. The fair divinities of old had two appellations, one by which they were known in heaven, and the other on earth. We hope the married one, on this occasion, is the former.

We entered the theatre while BRAHAM was in the midst of the glory of his Luther's Hymn, which he sings most nobly. And a most magnificent and affecting composition it is. Mr HARPER again delighted us with his trumpet obligato. Mr BRAHAM subsequently gave HANDEL'S 'Sound an alarm.' His own utterance of those words are "sound" and "alarm" enough, without the music. It is as if Stentor had come to earth again, and his voice had become melodious.

PERGOLESE'S 'Gloria in Excelsis,' a chorus in which all the singers take part, is a true bit of 'joy in heaven.' The Italians appear to us to be particularly excellent in the chearful part of their sacred music. They are not afraid of making heaven seem really a happy place. There is a pause, by the way, towards the close of this composition, the suddenness and length of which are singularly striking. We fancy the whole choir of heaven looking mutely upwards, absorbed in the bliss of the divine presence.

The beginning of AVISON'S 'Sound the loud timbrel' pleases us much. It is striking, original, and agreeable. Miss PEARSON, who took a part in it, and afterwards sang 'What though I trace,' was well received, and met with applause in both instances.

Miss PATON and Mr BRAHAM sang a duet from ROSSINI, not eminently good, nor can we think that their voices go well together. It is a pity to make them spoil one another. Mrs WAYLETT was encored in a pleasing ballad, the name of which we have overlooked. But the composition that upon the whole delighted us most, was HANDEL'S 'Let me wander not unseen,' from L'Allegro. That imitative passage about the 'merry bells,' comes very well in here, and is not a conceit; music having surely a right to imitate music, and the animal spirits of the line demanding it. The notes on the word 'dancing,' by the same rule, justly represent what they speak of, and are dancing itself. We were going to express a profane doubt, whether HANDEL, while he equalled MILTON in grandeur (as far as music can be said to equal poetry) did not surpass him in a sense of the pleasurable; but when we recollect the passage in the great bard, we abstain.

> 'Or let the merry bells ring round,
> And the jocund rebecs sound,
> To many a youth, and many a maid,
> Dancing in the checquer'd shade.'

What lightness, and bound of step is here! And how the bells peal over again in the word 'round!' The words marked in Italics in the third line set the elasticity of the motion before us; and then the accent, coming on the first syllable of the last line, expresses the bound. All poets, by the very tenure of their art, which implies the greatest delicacy of perception, most have a fine sense of the pleasurable; and the painter of Eden was assuredly no exception to the rule, whatever his Puritanism might have said to it.

We must not close this article without speaking of a former one upon the Oratorios, which called forth the nonsense of the "shabby paper" alluded to in consequence. A correspondent, whose indignant letter on the subject we are sorry to have mislaid, and who has our best thanks for his kindness, reminds us, that in addition to the insinuation which we refuted, it was implied, that we had been using a passage out of Mr HAZLITT'S writings, as if it had been our own:—at least, a passage of our own (upon the character of SHAKSPEARE'S Beatrice) was quoted in that paper, as if it had been Mr HAZLITT'S. We remembered hearing of this absurd implication, or whatever it may be called, before; but had forgotten it. Our readers surely need not be informed, that it was as false as the other, and that we never practise deceptions worthy only of the people that can suppose them. The criticism, every word of it, such as it was, was entirely our own. ☞

CLIMATE OF ENGLAND.—England is situate in the nothern part of the temperate zone; the longest day in the year being sixteen hours and thirty-four minutes; and the shortest, seven hours and forty-four minutes; so that independent of accidental circumstances, the country enjoys but a moderate share of the genial influence of the sun; and even during the period that luminary is above the horizon, the sky is frequently obscured by clouds, forming a striking contrast with the sunny skies of the south of Europe. Foreigners have abundantly complained of our gloomy atmosphere; and a Spanish Ambassador here in the reign of Charles I. not having seen the sun during a whole month previous to his departure, desired a courtier, who waited on him, to give his dutiful respects to his Majesty, and also to the sun whenever he might get a sight of him. But the deficiency is compensated by that peculiar freshness of vegetation, which characterises British landscape, and which depends on the frequent descent of the clouds in rain and dew. More rain falls in the western than in the eastern part of England, and more in the north than in the south. According to the experiments of Mr John Dalton, the annual average quantity that falls throughout all England, is thirty-one inches and three-tenths, and the annual average of the dew about six inches, which makes the whole depth of descending moisture thirty-six inches, of which about twenty-three inches are carried off by evaporation. From the Journals of the Royal Society, it appears that the annual quantity of rain in and near London is but twenty-one inches and a quarter. Though the weather in this country is proverbially changeable, yet the alternations of heat and cold are usually not excessive; and both the severity of winter and the parching heat of summer are felt here in a much less degree than in the parallel climates on the coutinent, a circumstance to be accounted for from our insular situation. The extreme of high temperature usually occurs in July or August, and that of low temperature in January; at the former period the mercury in the thermometer seldom rises above eighty-six degrees, and at the latter it rarely falls lower than eight or ten degrees; though sometimes it has sunk down to zero of Fahrenheit. Among the most severe frosts which ever happened in this country, is one recorded by Matthew Paris to have lasted from November to April in 1076; in the course of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries memorable frosts took place during the winters of 1683, 1709, & 1730. From the observations made by Mr Luke Howard, at Plaistow, it has been ascertained that the temperature of the air in London is raised two degrees above that of the surrounding country, by artificial causes. The wind is extremely uncertain, and its variations can scarcely be reduced to any fixed principles. It blows with the greatest strength and constancy from the south-west, hence detached and exposed trees lean in the opposite direction. East and north winds are more frequent on the eastern than on the western side of the island, and south and south-west winds are oftener felt on the latter than on the former. Tempests, extending generally over the country are fortunately rare occurrences. One of the most remarkable was that which took place November 26th, 1703, when Eddystone lighthouse was blown down. It may be remarked that thunder storms scarcely ever occur here between December and May. Among the more uncommon meteorological phenomena are aerolites, or stones, which have fallen from the atmosphere. In the British museum is a fragment of a meteoric stone, weighing fifty-six pounds, which fell near Wold Cottage, December 18th, 1795.—Gorton's Topographical Dictionary.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

FRIDAY, MARCH 11, 1831.

TO ADVERTISERS.

On Monday the 14th inst. The Tatler will begin to admit Advertisements, but under such an arrangement of its letter-press as will take nothing from the reader.

This opportunity may be particularly worthy the attention of those who deal in commodities conducive in any way to the Graces of Life, whether intellectual or external, such as Books, Music, Paintings, Engravings, Sculpture, Apparel, Jewellery, or any kind of Fancy Article; in short, anything connected with habits of elegance and refinement.

The space of The Tatler devoted to this purpose will be of necessity a great deal smaller than in other Daily Papers, so that every Advertisement will be sure of being seen; and Advertisers will bear in mind, that as the readers of the paper consist of Play-goers, Men of Leisure, Actors and Actresses, Accomplished Women in general, the Lovers of Books, Music, &c., and other cultivators of social intercourse and amusement, they form the very description of persons who are the most likely to repay the use made of its columns.

Advertisements received at The Tatler Office, 4 Catherine street, Strand; also by Mr G. Reynell, Country Newspaper and General Advertising Office, 42 Chancery lane; and by Messrs C. and W. Reynell, at the Printing Office. 45 Broad street, Golden square.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

Memoirs of the Life and Travels of John Ledyard, from his Journal and Correspondence. By Jared Sparks. 8vo. pp. 428. Colburn and Bentley.

We mentioned yesterday the reason which induced us to devote one of our articles to this book. We shall not scruple to inform the readers of The Tatler, between whom and the Editor there must naturally be supposed to be some literary inclinations in common, that it is a great favourite with us,—that we have read and re-read it, have scored and noted it, and have lent it round to our friends;—in short, that we love it, and have added the hero to the list of our admirables. If we had no pillow at hand when we went to bed, and were obliged to make one of books, this is one among the rest that we should lay our head on.

John Ledyard, son of John Ledyard, an Englishman who settled in America as a small trader, and of a beautiful and excellent woman, the daughter of Robert Hempstead of Scotland, was born in the year 1751, at Groton, in Connecticut, a small village on the bank of the river Thames, opposite to New London, and close to Fort Griswold, a place celebrated in the history of the American revolution. Colonel William Ledyard, conspicuous for his bravery as the commander in the action at Fort Griswold, and who was slain after the capitulation, was his younger brother.

Ledyard, like all enthusiastic men of good purposes, whose childhood has been blessed with maternal affection, retained a passionate love of his mother's memory throughout life. 'In his severest disappointments and privations, in whatever clime or among whatever people, whether contending with the fierce snows of Siberia, or the burning sands of Africa, the image of his mother (says his biographer) always came with a beam of joy to his soul, and was cherished there with delight.'

He resembled many eminent men in a point of his fortune not so pleasant;—he began life with being in a lawyer's office. This he quitted to enter a college for the education of missionaries among the Indians, where the restlessness of his temperament, an indistinct ambition for doing something great and remote, and an impatience of restraint which would have been less pardonable in one of a smaller cast of mind, did not allow him to stop long. Accordingly he recommenced life for himself after the fashion of Robinson Crusoe, but still more romantically, as the following extraordinary narrative will shew:—

'On the margin of the Connecticut river, which runs near the college, stood many majestic forest trees, nourished by a rich soil. One of these Ledyard contrived to cut down. He then set himself to work to fashion its trunk into a canoe, and in this labour he was assisted by some of his fellow-students. As the canoe was fifty feet long and three wide, and was to be dug out and constructed by these unskilful workmen, the task was not a trifling one, nor such as could be easily executed. Operations were carried on with spirit, however, till Ledyard wounded himself with an axe, and was disabled for several days. When recovered, he applied himself anew to his work, the canoe was finished, launched into the stream, and by the farther aid of his companions, equipped and prepared for a voyage. His wishes were now at their consummation, and, bidding adieu to these haunts of the Muses, where he had gained a dubious fame, he set off alone, with a light heart, to explore a river, with the navigation of which he had not the slightest acquaintance. The distance to Hartford was not less than one hundred and forty miles, much of the way was through a wilderness, and in several places there were dangerous falls and rapids.

'With a bear-skin for a covering, and his canoe well stocked with provisions, he yielded himself to the current, and floated leisurely down the stream, seldom using his paddle, and stopping only in the night for sleep. He told Mr Jefferson in Paris, fourteen years afterwards, that he took only two books with him, a Greek Testament, and Ovid, one of which he was deeply engaged in reading when he approached Below's Falls, where he was suddenly roused by the noise of the waters rushing among the rocks through the narrow passage. The danger was imminent, as no boat could go through that fall without being instantly dashed in pieces. With difficulty he gained the shore in time to escape such a catastrophe, and through the kind assistance of the people in the neighbourhood, who were astonished at the novelty of such a voyage down the Connecticut, his canoe was drawn by oxen round the fall, and committed again to the water below. From that time, until he arrived at the place of his destination, we hear of no accident, although he was carried through several dangerous passes in the river. On a bright spring morning, just as the sun was rising, some of Mr Seymour's family were standing near his house, on the high bank of the small river that runs through the city of Hartford, and empties itself into the Connecticut river, when they espied at some distance an object of unusual appearance moving slowly up the stream. Others were attracted by the singularity of the sight, and all were conjecturing what it could be, till its questionable shape assumed the true and obvious form of a canoe; but by what influence it was moved forward none could determine. Something was seen in the stern, but apparently without life or motion. At length the canoe touched the shore directly in front of the house; a person sprang from the stern to a rock in the edge of the water, threw off a bear-skin in which he had been enveloped, and behold, John Ledyard in the presence of his uncle and connexions, who were filled with wonder at this sudden apparition, for they had received no intelligence of his intention to leave Dartmouth, but supposed him still there diligently pursuing his studies, and fitting himself to be a missionary among the Indians.

'However unimportant this whimsical adventure may have been in its results, or even in its objects, it was one of no ordinary peril, and illustrated in a forcible manner the character of the navigator. The voyage was performed in the last part of April or first of May, and of course the river was raised by the recent melting of the snow on the mountains. This circumstance probably rendered the rapids less dangerous, but it may be questioned whether there are many persons at the present day, who would willingly run the same hazard, even if guided by a pilot skilled in the navigation of the river.

'We cannot look back to Ledyard, thus launching himself alone in so frail a bark, upon the waters of a river wholly unknown to him, without being reminded of the only similar occurrence which has been recorded,—the voyage down the river Niger, by Mungo Parke,—a name standing at the very head of those most renowned for lofty and romantic enterprise. The melancholy fate, it is true, by which he was soon arrested in his noble career, adds greatly to the interest of his situation, when pushing from the shore his little boat Joliba, and causes us to read his last affecting letter to his wife with emotions of sympathy, more intense, if possible, than would be felt, if the tragical issue were not already known. In many points of character there was a strong resemblance between these two distinguished travellers, and they both perished, martyrs in the same cause, attempting to explore the hidden regions of Africa.'—P. 21.

In spite of this strong testimony to his inaptitude for a tranquil occupation, Ledyard was still encouraged to become a divine, and recommenced his theological studies with a view of entering the church. But they were of little duration. He speedily started anew, in the most opposite of all characters, that of a common sailor, on board a vessel bound to Gibraltar. He went to Gibraltar and back again, found himself thrown on the world without a penny, and having in his childhood heard his grandfather talk of certain wealthy connexions in England, resolved to go to that country, and find them out. He went pennyless, and remained so; a cold reception on the part of a relative in London having driven him away from their house, with a disgust which no subsequent courting could do away. At this juncture he heard that Captain Cook was making preparation for a new voyage. He enlisted in the marine service, on purpose to warrant his application to the great navigator, gained his confidence immediately, and sailed with him as corporal.

Ledyard wrote a narrative of this fatal voyage, from which passages were quoted in our paper of yesterday. It was a slip of memory when we said that his officers were probably not aware of the singular man they had with them in this humble capacity. Captain Burney, in his Chronological History of North Eastern Voyages of Discovery, quoted in the work before us, says of him,—

'With what education I know not, but with an ardent disposition, Ledyard had a passion for lofty sentiments and description. When corporal of marines on board of the Resolution, after the death of Captain Cook, he proferred his services to Captain Clerke, to undertake the office of historiographer to our expedition, and presented a specimen, which described the manners of the Society Islanders, and the kind of life led by our people whilst among them. He was not aware how many candidates he would have to contend with, if the office to which he aspired had been vacant; perhaps not with fewer than with every one in the two ships who kept journals. Literary ambition and disposition to authorship led us in each ship to set up a weekly paper. When the paper in either ship was ready for delivery, a signal was made, and when answered by a similar signal from the other ship, Captain Cook, if the weather was fine, would good-naturedly let a boat be hoisted out, to make the exchange; and he was always glad to read our paper, but never favoured our editors with the contribution of a paragraph. I believe none of these papers have been saved, nor do I remember by what title we distinguished them. Ledyard's performance was not criticised in our paper, as that would have entitled him to a freedom of controversy not consistent with military subordination. His ideas were thought too sentimental, and his language too florid. No one, however, doubted that his feelings were in accord with his expressions; and the same may be said of the little which remains of what he has since written, more worthy of being preserved, and which its worthiness will preserve, and particularly of his celebrated commendation of women, in his Siberian Tour.'—P. 51.

Ledyard's style of writing was likely to be too florid when he was young. It is a common case with young enthusiasts, who do not properly know how to express the amount of their feelings. It was not so in his later writings, though the enthusiasm remained. Ledyard, from his boyhood, was remarkable for his love of truth; with which a false style is incompatible, however its warmth may be mistaken by the cold or the hypocritical. It was this sincerity which made him the most valuable of all the narrators of the death of Captain Cook; and it was the sacrifice of it to a fancied expediency which brought the great navigator to his end. Ledyard thinks also that Captain Cook erred on the score of severity towards the islanders whom he visited. Cook's understanding was a formal one compared with Ledyard's. The latter knew more of human nature, and of the modifications of its virtues and vices by custom. The propensity to thieving among the South Sea Islanders, which Cook regarded in as criminal a light as if it had been practised by his commercial countrymen, appears to have been rather the result of childish levity, and of unsettled notions of the meum and tuum, among that simple and good-natured people. Ledyard thought Cook's severity in punishing it impolitic, on another score besides that of injustice. 'It must be remembered,' he says with great fairness, 'that the ability of performing the important task before us, depended very much, if not entirely, upon the precarious supplies we might procure from these and other such islands, and he must of consequence be very anxious and solicitous in this concernment; but perhaps no consideration will excuse the severity which he sometimes used towards the natives on these occasions; and he would probably have done better to consider, that the full exertion of extreme power is an argument of extreme weakness; and nature seemed to inform the insulted natives of the truth of this maxim; for before we quitted Tongataboo, we could not go anywhere into the country upon business or pleasure, without danger.'—P. 76.

After the death of Captain Cook, Ledyard remained with the officer who succeeded him, to the close of his voyage, and was subsequently in the British navy for two years, 'though what rank he held,' says his biographer, 'has not been ascertained.' From a word, however, which we are about to quote, the same writer speaks as if he had been an officer. At the end of these two years, he is found off the coast of America, in Long Island Sound, on board a British man-of-war; but not being able, in spite of his indifference to politics, to reconcile himself to the service of a nation which was then at war with his countrymen, he clandestinely quitted the ship, and again found himself without employment. This is the only occasion in which Ledyard's strait-forwardness of conduct is liable to suspicion. His scruples against serving with the British were anterior to his entrance into the man-of-war; and in order to set himself free, he obtained permission of seven days' absence from the ship, apparently for the purpose of seeing his mother, who lived at Southold in Long Island, but 'evidently intending,' says his biographer, 'to return no more.' How he reconciled to himself this compromise with his favourite virtue, we cannot tell. We can only hope the best, while we record the worst. Probably with all his love of the truth, it was not yet fixed in him as a habit. No common expediency, at all events, could have been at the bottom of the compromise; for an attention to self-interest, in the usual acceptation of the word, was notoriously foreign to his nature. His interview with his mother reminds us of a similar passage in the Life of Smollett:—

'She kept a boarding-house, which was at that time occupied chiefly by British officers. He rode up to the door, alighted, went in, and asked if he could be accommodated in her house as a lodger. She replied that he could, and shewed him a room, into which his baggage was conveyed. After having adjusted his dress, he came out and took a seat by the fire, in company wtth several other officers, without making himself known to his mother, or entering into conversation with any person. She frequently passed and repassed through the room, and her eye was observed to be attracted towards him with more than usual attention. He still remained silent. At last, after looking at him for some minutes, she deliberately put on her spectacles, approached nearer to him, begging his pardon for her rudeness, and telling him, that he so much resembled a son of hers, who had been absent eight years, that she could not resist her inclination to view him more closely. The scene that followed may be imagined, but not described; for Ledyard had a tender heart, and affection for his mother was among its deepest and most constant emotions.'—P. 168.

As Long Island was then in possession of the British, our adventurer thought it fit to go over to the continent, before his seven days' leave of absence had expired. He now tried to prevail on somebody to give him the command of a merchant vessel, in order to open a commerce in furs with the north-western coast. While prosecuting this endeavour, he wrote a letter to his mother, in which there is the following passage:—'If I am successful, I shall not have occasion to absent myself any more from my friends; but above all, I hope to have it in my power to minister to the wants of a beloved parent, and others who languish and fade in obscurity. My dear sisters engage my tenderest love and solicitude for their future welfare. My best wish is, that they may be educated and disposed of, suitably to the beauty of their persons and their excellent hearts, and that I could be instrumental in conferring such a kindness. I beg my brotherly salutations to them. Tell them I long to strew roses in their laps, and branches of palm beneath their feet.'—P. 179.

Ledyard's project did not succeed. He did not get the employment, and had only the melancholy honour of being the first to suggest a new channel of commerce, which has turned out very lucrative to merchants in both hemispheres. Not however giving up his design, and furnished with letters of recommendation to different merchants, he went to Spain, then to France, where he seemed to procure what he wanted, and expected to sail on another voyage round the world. But he was disappointed as before. He proceeded to Paris, where Jefferson was then ambassador from the United States, and had an interview with that patriot, who highly approved of his design of exploring the north-western coast of America. But when everything again promised for the best, he was again disappointed. Various persons who had joined with him in his schemes, had found it just and proper to enable him to live, but these repeated disappointments made him very uneasy. 'He felt himself,' says his biographer, 'a wanderer, without employment or motive. With Mr Jefferson, the Marquis de la Fayette, Mr Barclay, the American consul, and other gentlemen of character and consequence, he was on terms of intimacy. In this society, and enjoying the amusements as afforded in the capital of France, his time passed away agreeably enough, and in some of his letters he speaks of his happiness; yet he was far from being satisfied; he suffered under the pressure of want, and a corroding sense of dependence; and occasionally his finances were at so low an ebb, that he was compelled, however reluctantly, to be a pensioner on the bounty of his friends.

So disinterested were his aims, however, and so entirely did he sacrifice every selfish consideration in prosecuting them; so benevolent was his disposition, and so enlarged his views of serving mankind, that no one considered favours of this sort in the light of obligations conferred, nor so much acts of charity, but as a just tribute to the singleness of his heart, the generosity of his purposes, and the effective warmth of his zeal.'

We must conclude tomorrow. The best is to come.

QUEEN'S THEATRE.

THIS enterprising theatre is superabundant in its novelties. Last night it gave us two new pieces at once: and as if to reward its exertions, both were successful.

The first, The Danish Wife, is melo-dramatic in its style and plot. Count Ernest of Cronstadt (Mr FORRESTER), is accused, under suspicious circumstances, of having committed a murder, which was really perpetrated by a gambling domestic of his (Mr KEPPELL) to recruit his finances by robbery. The domestic, who had been his foster-brother, sees him arrested, carried away, and condemned to death, not without great remorse; and he is several times on the point of proclaiming his guilt; but fear prevents him. The Countess (Miss PELHAM), in vain enables her husband to escape from prison, by disguising him in her cloak. He re-appears of his own accord, in order to rescue the real criminal, who having seized the opportunity of repairing some part of his wrong by assisting his master to disguise himself, had given him his mantle for that purpose; and assuming the other's, had subjected himself to be mistaken for him. The guilty man is seized with double remorse at this gallant self-sacrifice, and is once more about to proclaim his enormity; but is again tongue-tied with fear. The Count therefore is finally about to be sacrificed, when his wife rushes in with a clue to the real murderer. Peter Pluffen, a domestic (Mr SMITH), between whom and Mina (Mrs HUMBY)—my lady's servant (if we remember)—a little side-plot of servants' love is going forward, has found in the clenched hand of the murderer's victim a piece of cloth with a button attached to it. This had been torn in the struggle of death from the murderer's waistcoat. The criminal's coat is thrown open, the rent is manifest, and the piece concludes with his falling to the earth in an agony of horror.

We have not much to say in favour of the execution of this piece, and therefore are willing to say little about it; for the sentiments are generous. The plot, as the reader sees, is of an ancient description; and there is a figurative ambition in the style, which nevertheless does not rise above mediocrity, and is not always in season. The sufferers talk too ostentatiously. The best passage is where the Count, on awaking after a night in prison, and comparing the sense of his situation to a dreadful cloud, says he feels it "come rolling round him." This is strongly and truly expressive of the sense of any calamity, felt upon awaking in the morning. The scene we liked best was that of the two sweethearts having a little amantium iræ quarrel, and returning one another their presents.

Miss PELHAM is a new actress from the English Theatre at Paris. We are loth to form judgments from a first performance; but as far as we can observe at present, we should say that she has occasional touches of truth and tenderness, far from common, especially in the more familiar passages of grief; but not much power to sustain the intervals, nor always to modulate her voice without some danger to its proper gravity of effect. When she gets into the most tragic part of the high melo-dramatic strain, she is apt to overdo the matter, like most of the queens of small stages. But she might become very useful, if there were much serious acting at this house. Mr KEPPELL, who is a new performer from the York Theatre, was also most efficient when he was quietest. His faltering denials, with an assumed air of calmness betraying agitation, met with deserved applause. Mr FORRESTER, whom we have been accustomed to see in comedy, acted his serious part much better than we had looked for.

The other new piece, entitled Delusions, is of the comic after-piece order, though it has grave matter too for one of the characters. Charles Euston (Mr GREEN) is a young gentleman with eighty thousand pounds to his fortune, who pronounces himself the happiest of mankind. He has the best friend, the best mistress, the best horse, and the best attorney that ever were heard of,—and the "best servant," adds his modest valet (Mr SMITH). After a happy breakfast one morning, with these pleasant thoughts upon him, he takes up the newspaper, and finds that his attorney and the eighty thousand pounds have gone off together. He goes in an agony to the attorney's partner, who has nothing to say except that everything is "a most extraordinary business." He goes to the house of his best friend, and finds that he had left town, just after reading the account in the newspaper. He goes to the house of his mistress, and sees her evidently escaping from him into a coach, which conveys her away. He then goes home to shoot himself.—He is in the act of firing the pistol, when Jack Fraser, his friend, who had come meanwhile to see him, dashes his hand up, and saves his life; an obligation, which Jack follows up, by putting into his hand his rescued fortune, to save which he had followed the attorney to Dover and nearly beaten him to death. Our hero has not recovered his surprise, when his mistress comes in, ignorant of his good fortune, and tells him that she has just been to her aunt's house, where she hurried on the first news of his mishap; that the good old lady has given him a house, and promised him half her fortune;—and that, in the meantime, if a "poor five-hundred a year," and the hand of one that loves him will make him any amends, they are at his service. Mr Euston (that is his name) who had become full of indignation and declamation at the faithlessness of friends, and mistresses, and all mankind, returns with a delighted remorse to his first happy opinions; and with a strong recommendation of them to the audience, the piece concludes.

The audience were so pleased with it, that on the fall of the curtain they gave four distinct rounds of applause,—besides numerous marks of approbation during its progress. There are several pleasant points in the dialogue; and altogether it is one of the compactest and most agreeable little pieces we have seen a good while. We are specially pleased with the liberality and honest faith of the sentiments; which, no less to our delight, and to the great credit of the audience, found a most hearty welcome on all sides.

An attempt to get up a clap for the Duke of WELLINGTON was not so prosperous; nor could the author, on a little reflection, have expected that it should be; for the same diffusion of knowledge, and the same events, which have led to this glad recognition of generous principles, have produced the unpopularity of the late anti-reforming Minister. When his name was mentioned in the piece (in connexion with the battle of Waterloo) not a syllable of approbation ensued; but several hisses did. The circumstance was remarkable, and affords no mean additional sign of the times, especially at the present moment.

Mr SMITH acted the part of a humorous servant in this piece very well indeed. Mr GREEN acted the hero; but displayed nothing to induce us to form a higher opinion of him than before.

We have forgotten to mention that there is some good new scenery in the Danish Wife, particularly a view in Copenhagen.

We again saw the French dancers, who are engaged for six nights more, and the wonderful pirouetting of Mademoiselle CELESTE, whom we now think as graceful as she is agile. ☞

A JUDICIOUS PRECAUTION.—After the tomb (Hume's) was finished (says an ingenious contemporary of Hume) one summer day, I was sauntering on the Calton Hill, in company with the late well known Dr Gilbert Stuart, and Dr John Brown, author of what is called the Brunonian System of Physic. Dr Brown, who was a man of rough and coarse manners, spoke to a mason who was heaving a pavement stone:—"Friend," said he, "this is a strong and massy building; but how do you think the honest gentleman can get out at the resurrection?" The mason archly replied, "Sir, I have secured that point; for I have put the key under the door."—Smellie's Literary and Characteristic Lives.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

SATURDAY, MARCH 12, 1831.

TO ADVERTISERS.

On Monday the 14th inst. The Tatler will begin to admit Advertisements, but under such an arrangement of its letter-press as will take nothing from the reader.

This opportunity may be particularly worthy the attention of those who deal in commodities conducive in any way to the Graces of Life, whether intellectual or external, such as Books, Music, Paintings, Engravings, Sculpture, Apparel, Jewellery, or any kind of Fancy Article; in short, anything connected with habits of elegance and refinement.

The space of The Tatler devoted to this purpose will be of necessity a great deal smaller than in other Daily Papers, so that every Advertisement will be sure of being seen; and Advertisers will bear in mind, that as the readers of the paper consist of Play-goers, Men of Leisure, Actors and Actresses, Accomplished Women in general, the Lovers of Books, Music, &c , and other cultivators of social intercourse and amusement, they form the very description of persons who are the most likely to repay the use made of its columns.

Advertisements received at The Tatler Office, 4 Catherine street, Strand; also by Mr G. Reynell, Country Newspaper and General Advertising Office, 42 Chancery lane; and by Messrs C. and W. Reynell, at the Printing Office, 45 Broad street, Golden square.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

Memoirs of the Life and Travels of John Ledyard, from his Journal and Correspondence. By Jared Sparks. 8vo. pp. 428. Colburn and Bentley.

(Concluded from yesterday.)

Finding himself unable to prosecute his designs by sea, Ledyard resolved upon doing it by land. He actually determined to walk through the north of Europe, Siberia and Tartary, with a precarious pittance in his pocket, and so get a short passage over to the north-western coast of America. His extraordinary designs, and the generous openness of his character, procured him, as we have seen, extraordinary friends, men of whom even he had reason to be proud. Among them the reader has seen mentioned Mr Jefferson, and the Marquis (as he was then called) Lafayette. The effect produced by the name of this illustrious person in the pages of Ledyard, great as it always was, has become greater from late events. It is with no common emotion that the admirers of his late conduct, read over again the passages in which he is mentioned by his grateful friend. Speaking of him in a letter to some unknown person, Ledyard says :—

'I am sure that you could not yourself have manifested more alacrity to serve me than he has done.'

Again, in his last letter from France, dated the 8th of August 1786, four-and-forty years ago, he says,—'I took a walk to Paris this morning, and saw the Marquis de la Fayette. He is a good man, this same Marquis. I esteem him, and even love him, and so we all do, except some few, who worship him.' The surprise of this last turn is very pleasant. He adds, 'I make these trips to Paris often; sometimes to dine with this amiable Frenchman, and sometimes with our minister, (Jefferson), who is a brother to me.'

Again, in a striking passage of a letter written to Jefferson from England:—'You know how much I owe the amiable Lafayette. Will you do me the honour to present my most grateful thanks to him? If I find in my travels a mountain, as much elevated above other mountains as he is above ordinary men, I will name it Lafayette.'

Once more. In a letter to the same friend, dated Petersburgh, March 19th, 1787, is the following passage:—'I hardly know how to estimate the goodness of the Marquis de la Fayette to me; but I think a French nobleman, of the first character in his country, never did more to serve an obscure citizen of another, than he has done for me; and I am sure, that it is impossible, without some kind of soul made expressly for the purpose, that an obscure citizen in such a situation can be more grateful than I am. May he be told so, with my compliments to his lady.'

Ledyard, however, was destined to undergo another bitter disappointment before he could arrive at the spot from which he was to have the happiness of commencing his tour of peril and poverty. He left Paris for London, apparently on the invitation of Sir James Hall, one of his generous friends, (father of Captain Basil Hall. What a pity that his son has become an enemy to Americans and to Lafayette! From London, our hero was to sail for the north-western coast in a vessel which he found in complete readiness for a voyage to the Pacific Ocean, and the owners of which offered him a free passage, with the understanding, it is supposed, of profiting by his knowledge and experience. The vessel put to sea, and was not out of sight of land, when it was brought back by an order from the government, and the voyage broken off. A subscription was now set on foot among his friends in London, (Sir James Hall, Sir Joseph Banks and others) to enable him to get to Hamburgh, and commence his journey on foot.

'"I fear my subscription will be small," he says, in a letter to Mr Jefferson; "it adds to my anxiety to reach those dominions, where I shall not want money; I do not mean the dominions that may be beyond death. I shall never wish to die, while you and the Marquis are alive. I am going across Siberia, as I before intended." The amount collected by his friends is not mentioned, but it was such as to induce him to set out on the journey; which, indeed, he probably would have done, had he obtained no money at all. He had lived too long by expedients to be stopped in his career by an obstacle so trifling, in his imagination, as the want of money; and he was panting to get into a country where its use was unknown, and where of course the want of it would not be felt.'—P. 235.

Ledyard proceeded to Hamburgh; passed on to Copenhagen, where he met with a distressed countryman, whom he relieved in the most generous manner; went round the Gulf of Bothnia on foot, through Sweden, Lapland, and Finland; arrived at Petersburgh, where he was befriended by Professor Pallas and others; procured a passport from the Empress Catherine, through the agency of Count Segur, the French ambassador; travelled through Siberia, Muscovy, and Tartary; and when he had arrived at what appeared to him but a short distance from that blessed coast, from which he was to cross over to the long object of his desires, was first detained under false pretences, then, while pushing on, was arrested by an order from the Empress, and finally banished the empire, and conveyed to the frontiers of Poland, with an injunction not to return into the Russian dominions under pain of death.

There have been various conjectures respecting the cause of this flagrant exercise of arbitrary power. The commandant who first detained him, said that he did it out of humanity; and indeed Catherine herself made the same excuse to the French Ambassador, observing, "That she would not render herself guilty of the death of this courageous American, by furthering a journey so fraught with danger, as that he proposed to undertake alone, across the unknown and savage regions of north-western America." We do not bring up the sanguinary wars of Catherine, as a proof that she could not be humane to an individual; for in the semi-barbarous condition of mankind, the greatest want of feeling on a large scale, and the tenderest exercise of it on a smaller, have often been found co-existent. But notwithstanding that Catherine was as likely as anybody to exhibit this inconsistency, there is nobody who would not laugh at the probability of such a tender consideration as this, shewn towards a man who would have given worlds to prevent it, and upon an account which she would have thought unworthy of her regard, had his object been a Russian instead of an American one. Segur thought it owing to her unwillingness to have her new possessions on the western coast inspected by an American citizen; and undoubtedly either this was the cause, or it was owing to the jealousy of the Russian Fur Company, the most likely conjecture of all. Their head quarters were at the place at which Ledyard was detained.

From the confines to which the Russian soldiers had conveyed him, Ledyard, to use his own words, passed, he "knew not how," through the kingdoms of Poland and Prussia, and thence to London, where he arrived, "disappointed, ragged, and pennyless;" and yet, said he, "so accustomed am I to such things, that I declare my heart was whole....Cruelties and hardships are tales I leave untold." His health, for the first time, had suffered from confinement, and from the extraordinary rapidity with which he had been whirled over the Russian deserts: but the recovery of his freedom, "and a few days rest among the beautiful daughters of Israel in Poland," made him feel as strong as before; though he acknowledges that three years had made a great difference in the look of his face. He was then thirty-seven.

It was at the place of his detention, and while unconscious of what was about to be done against him by a female (though she would have made no difference, for despots are of no sex) that Ledyard wrote his celebrated Eulogy on Women, one of the never-to-be-too-often-repeated bits of genuine eloquence. Here accordingly it follows:—

'I have observed among all nations, that the women ornament themselves more than the men; that wherever found, they are the same kind, civil, obliging, humane, tender beings; that they are ever inclined to be gay and cheerful, timorous and modest. They do not hesitate, like man, to perform a hospitable or generous action; not haughty, nor arrogant, nor supercilious, but full of courtesy, and fond of society; industrious, economical, ingenuous; more liable, in general, to err than man, but in general also more virtuous, and performing more good actions than he. I never addressed myself, in the language of decency and friendship, to a woman, whether civilized or savage, without receiving a decent and friendly answer. With man it has often been otherwise. In wandering over the barren plains of inhospitable Denmark, through honest Sweden, frozen Lapland, rude and churlish Finland, unprincipled Russia, and the wide-spread regions of the wandering Tartar, if hungry, dry, cold, wet, or sick, woman has ever been friendly to me, and uniformly so; and to add to this virtue, so worthy of the appellation of benevolence, these actions have been performed in so free and so kind a manner, that, if I was dry, I drank the sweet draught, and, if hungry, ate the coarse morsel, with a double relish.'

No wonder the beautiful daughters of Israel in Poland conspired to restore the health of a man who could write thus. Ledyard, however, did not think ill of men as human beings. He knew his own heart and intentions too well, not to think the best he could of all. There is a passage in his letter to Mr Jefferson from St Petersburgh, no less just than affecting. 'Upon the whole,' he says, 'mankind have used me well; and though I have as yet reached only the first stage of my journey, I feel myself much indebted for that urbanity, which I always thought more general than many think it to be; and were it not for the mischievous laws and bad examples of some governments I have passed through, I am persuaded I should be able to give you a still better account of our fellow-creatures.'

No sooner was Ledyard arrived in London, says Mr Sparks, 'than he called upon his worthy patron and friend, Sir Joseph Banks, to express his gratitude for the many substantial favours received from him.'—(Ledyard had occasionally drawn at hazard upon Sir Joseph for small sums of money, and the philosopher had handsomely honoured his drafts.)—'Sir Joseph, after questioning him with a lively interest concerning his travels, and expressing sympathy for his past misfortunes, enquired what were his future intentions. Ledyard frankly confessed that he had nothing in prospect; that after having struggled against a tide of difficulties, to accomplish an object which he had much at heart, but in pursuing which he had been baffled in every attempt, he felt himself at this moment in a state of perfect uncertainty, as to the step next to be taken; time and circumstances would decide his fortune. What followed will be best related in the language of Mr Beaufoy, then Secretary of the African Association:—

'"Sir J. Banks, who knew his temper (says Mr B.) told him, that he believed he could recommend him to an adventure almost as perilous as the one from which he had returned; and then communicated to him the wishes of the Association for discovering the nland countries of Africa. Ledyard replied, that he had always determined to traverse the continent of Africa, as soon as he had explored the interior of North America; and as Sir Joseph had offered him a letter of introduction, he came directly to the writer of these Memoirs. Before I learnt from the note the name and business of my visitor, I was struck with the manliness of his person, the breadth of his chest, the openness of his countenance, and the inquietude of his eye. I spread the map of Africa before him, and tracing a line from Cairo to Sennar, and from thence westward, in the latitude and supposed direction of the Niger, I told him, that was the route by which I was anxious that Africa might, if possible, be explored. He said, he should think himself singularly fortunate to be trusted with the adventure. I asked him when he would set out. To-morrow morning, was his answer. I told him I was afraid that we should not be able, in so short a time, to prepare his instructions, and to procure for him the letters that were requisite; but that if the Committee should approve of his proposal, all expedition should be used."

'This interview affords one of the most extraordinary instances of decision of character, which is to be found on record. When we consider his recent bitter experience of the past, his labours and sufferings, which had been so intense and so long-continued, that a painful reality had more than checked the excesses of romantic enthusiasm that might be kindled in a less disciplined imagination; and when we witness the promptitude with which he is ready to encounter new perils in the heart of Africa, where hardships of the severest kind must inevitably be endured, and where death would stare him in the face at every stage; we cannot but admire the superiority of mind over the accidents of human life, the rapidity of combination, quickness of decision, and fearlessness of consequences, which Ledyard's reply indicates. It was the spontaneous triumph of an elevated spirit over the whole catalogue of selfish considerations, wavering motives, and half-subdued doubts, which would have contended for days in the breast of most men, before they would have adopted a firm resolution to jeopard their lives, in an undertaking so manifestly beset with dangers, and which in its best aspect threatened to be a scene of toils, privations, and endurance. It is needless to say, thal the Committee of the Association immediately closed an agreement with a man, who presented himself with such a temper, and with numerous other qualities, which fitted him im a peculiar manner for their service. Preparations for his departure were commenced without delay.'

The departure took place. Mr Beaufoy had an interview with Ledyard just as he was setting off, and repeats the following passage from his conversation:—'I am accustomed,' said Ledyard, 'to hardship. I have known both hunger and nakedness to the utmost extremity of human suffering. I have known what it is to have food given me as charity to a mad-man; and I have at times been obliged to shelter myself under the miseries of that character, to avoid a heavier calamity. My distresses have been greater than I have ever owned, or ever will own, to any man. Such evils are terrible to bear; but they never yet had power to turn me from my purpose. If I live, I will faithfully perform, in its utmost extent, my engagement to the society; and if I perish in the attempt, my honour will still be safe, for death cancels all bonds.'

How affecting is this!—And the following, how noble!—'I shall never,' he says, in writing to Mr Jefferson from Egypt, 'think my letter an indifferent one, when it contains the declaration of my gratitude and my affection for you; and this, notwithstanding you thought hard of me for being employed by an English Association, which hurt me much while I was at Paris. You know your own heart; and if my suspicions are groundless, forgive them, since they proceed from the jealousy I have, not to lose the regard you have in times past been pleased to honour me with. You are not obliged to esteem me, but I am obliged to esteem you, or to take leave of my senses, and confront the opinions of the greatest and best characters I know. If I cannot, therefore, address myself to you as a man you regard, I must do it as one that regards you for your own sake, and for the sake of my country, which has set me the example.'—P. 400.

Nobler, or more refined words than these, never graced a pen.

Before he took ship for Egypt, which he did at Marseilles, Ledyard had the happiness of seeing Jefferson, Lafayette, and others of his old friends at Paris. He stayed there a few days, arrived in Egypt in due course of time, and took up his lodging at Cairo, to wait for the caravan that was to take him to the desert. He now imagined himself secure of an honest fame and a beneficent enterprise. He had the employment he wanted, the funds that were necessary, and "imagined his severest cares were over." At this moment, while thus waiting for the caravan, and after a few months residence in Cairo, the exposure to the heat of the sun, which his pursuits rendered necessary, together with the bad effects of the climate, at the most unfavourable season of the year, brought upon him an attack of a bilious complaint, and at the end of November 1788, he was no more. He was then within two years of forty.

His character will have been seen from his life. It was his sincerity as well as kindness, that obtained him so much love. He was one of those rare men who could afford to be obliged, because he had no misgiving of his own disinterestedness; and luckily he found (as such men perhaps generally do) friends, who equally knew how to oblige. He would have made a fine writer, had he turned his ambition that way; for he had a wise heart, and he knew how to let it speak for itself.

He failed, by extraordinary chances, in every enterprize which he meditated; but not so, in the noblest of all results. Such a man as Ledyard makes other men. He is one of the fathers of the race of enthusiastic admirers; and these either recommend his examples in books, or complete it by their own.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

DRURY LANE.—A Grand Selection of Miscellaneous Music.

DRURY LANE.

WE should have had little to say of the Musical Selection last night, if 'Alexis,' with Mr LINDLEY's accompaniment, and MARTINI's 'Laughing Trio,' had not tempted us to stay late enough to hear two-thirds of Part the Second; which is a great deal too much for one evening, considering what we have already considered on that subject.

Mr LINDLEY carved and coaxed his violoncello in as fine stile as usual. The Laughing Terzettino, or Little Trio, has grown fat with laughing since we heard it first, and become a Little Quartett. Mr HORN, who took a part in it, has gone out of the firm, which is now made up of Mr PHILLIPS and Mr SINCLAIR, with the addition of BRAHAM and Miss HUGHES. The audience did not make the mistake, this time, of supposing that Mr PHILLIPS laughed whether he would or no: and having found out their error, we thought they were not going to laugh themselves. They did so however very heartily, as the close came on; and the performance was again twice encored, Mr PHILLIPS playing his part as admirably as before, if not still better. And the other singers entered into the joke. The amount of the words is simply this:—'Go along: this is too ridiculous: I cannot help laughing:'—but the air is so sprightly, and the laugh so well imitated, that nothing can be better calculated to make the joke contagious, and sweep the laughter of the house into its vortex. The sameness of the rhymes is an addition to the effect:—

Vadasi via di quà,
Che questo in verità
Da ridere mi fa;—
Ah, ah, ah, ah, ah, ah!

Mrs WAYLETT was encored in two of her favourite ballads, which she sung "by request,"—'Kate Kearney,' and 'Away to the Mountain's brow.' The former is a beautiful Irish ballad, of which we have spoken before; the latter a very pretty one, by Mr LEE. It is a refinement, we see, of the play-bills, to say "by request," where a female singer is concerned, and "by desire," for a gentleman; which, as Mr PEPYS says, "It is pretty to observe."

Miss PEARSON's friends, we must say, are indiscreet, and will do her a mischief with the public, if they do not take care. They selected, last night, the least effective air she has sung perhaps during the Oratorios, to found a clapping upon, and force an encore. The consequence was, that a great noise ensued; and after a long struggle, which must have put the young lady's feelings severely to the test, the song (we believe, for we did not hear when she began) was hurried through during the confusion. Another scene like this might hurt her greatly with the town, especially considering the sense they already entertain of her having been brought somewhat too pertinaciously forward. It is a false notion, that a liking can be forced upon them under such circumstances, by mere dint of insisting upon it. The town, we grant, may give way to a false taste, or a fashion, and sometimes be led into it by others; but to say nothing of the ill compliment paid to Miss PEARSON by a hope for her so derived, the town's own inclination must help them to be led away. They will not go headlong at any person's bidding that pleases, and for nothing at all. ☞

THE INVENTION OF WIGS.—Philip the Good, Duke of Burgundy, having become bald very early in life, from the effects of a severe illness, and being unwilling to disfigure himself by wearing a cap in the high solemnities of the court, although unable from indisposition to remain bare-headed; a barber of Bruges, by his ingenious invention of a peruque, reconciled every difficulty. This new fashion was eagerly adopted by the Flemish courtiers; and having shaved their heads in deference to the baldness of their sovereign, it is recorded that five hundred wigs appeared in Brussels, very shortly after the invention of this important adjunct to the toilet.—Historical Traveller.

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

"The little and short sayings of wise and excellent men are of great value, like the dust of gold, or the least sparks of diamonds."—Tillotson.

SUSPICIOUS SPEED.—A pilot in old times made a voyage in the space of a month, which had formerly occupied a year. He was considered as a sorcerer: the Inquisition, which is ridiculous for its ignorance, when it is not odious for its outrages, caused him to be arrested. His journal justified him: it was seen, that to have the same success they had only to sail at a distance from the shore; and the sorcerer's method was generally adopted.—Esprit de G. T. Raynal.—[It is well for the engineers of the present day, that the Inquisition "was such a long way off, and such a long time ago," as not to be formidable to our Genii of Steam.]

QUILL PENS.—One of the earliest records of the use of quills in writing, is in the Life of Constantius, as quoted by Adrian de Valois, who asserts that "Theodric, King of the Goths, could never be taught to form a royal signature; but that a plate of gold being laid at the bottom of his edicts, with the requisite four letters cut out in it, he was enabled to trace them with a quill.—Mrs Gore's Historical Traveller.—[Some centuries hence, the use of quills in writing will probably be entirely superseded by the modern metallic pens, and will be considered by posterity, as we now consider the reeds and styles of the ancients,—with mingled respect and self-complacency.]

ORIGIN OF THE WORD MAGNET.—The mountains about Magnesia were anciently famous for the production of the load-stone: though indeed it is disparaged by Pliny, and accounted less attractive than that of other places. However this was probably the city from whence, as Lucretius says, that stone took the name of Magnet, as from the whole country of Lydia (in which Magnesia is situated), the touch-stone was called Lapis Lydius.—Chishull's Travels in Turkey.

BAPTISMAL CEREMONIES OF THE ANCIENT HIGHLANDERS.—When an infant was christened, in order to counteract the power of evil spirits, witches, &c. he was put on a basket with bread and cheese, wrapped up in a linen cloth, and thus the basket and contents were handed across the fire, or suspended on the pot-crook that hung from the joist over the fire-place. Immediately after this ceremony, a dish of crowdie (a mixture of oatmeal and water) was presented, and each of the company took three horn-spoonsful.—Campbell's Tour in Scotland.

SHIP-BUILDING.—To give an idea of the enormous quantity of timber necessary to construct a ship of war, we may observe that 2,000 tons, or 3,000 loads, are computed to be required for a 74. Now, reckoning 50 oaks to the acre, of 100 years' standing, and the quantity in each tree to be a load and a half, it would require 40 acres of oak forest to build one 74; and the quantity increases in a great ratio for the largest classes of line-of-battle ships. The average duration of these vast machines, when employed, is computed to be 14 years. It is supposed that all the full-grown oaks now in Scotland would not build two ships of the line.—Quarterly Journal of Agriculture.

A REMNANT OF OLD HIGHLAND SUPERSTITION.—On the first day of May (old style) which is Beltin-day, the boys of the neighbouring hamlets meet, and retire to some sequestered spot amid the hills, where they cut a circular trench out of the green turf, in the centre of which a table is formed, round which they sit and eat a repast dressed in the following manner for the occasion:—Milk and eggs being made into the consistence of a custard, and oatmeal cake is kneaded very thick, and toasted by being set up against a stone at the embers: this is called a bonnach chloich, or stone-cake. As a portion of this cake is to be distributed to each person present, it is cut into the requisite number of pieces. One bit of it is then bedaubed with charcoal, and the whole put into a bonnet. Each lad draws out a bit; and he to whose lot the black falls, is said to be devoted to Beal-teine, Beltin, or Baal's fire, as a sacrifice. Instead of actual immolation, however, the victim is made to skip three times through the glowing embers, and here the ceremony ends.—Campbell's Tour in Scotland. 1802.

OWLS IN BURROWS.—Major Head thus describes a curious species of owl, found all over the Pampas of South America. "Like rabbits, they live in holes, which are in groups in every direction, and which makes galloping over these plains very dangerous. These animals are never seen in the day; but, as soon as the lower limb of the sun reaches the horizon, they are seen issuing from their holes in all directions, which are scattered in groups, like little villages, all over the Pampas. The biscachos, when full grown, are nearly as big as badgers, but their head resembles a rabbit's, except that they have large bushy whiskers. In the evening they sit outside their holes, and they all appear to be moralising. They are the most serious looking animals I ever saw; and even the young ones are grey-headed, wear mustachios, and look thoughtful and grave. In the day-time, their holes are guarded by two little owls which are never an instant away from their posts. As one gallops by these owls, they always stand looking at the stranger, and then at each other, moving their old-fashioned heads in a manner which is quite ridiculous, until one rushes by them, when fear gets the better of their dignified looks, and they both run into the biscacho's hole."—Knowledge for the People, Part IV.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

MONDAY, MARCH 14, 1831.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

We this day commence our Advertisements. We confine them at present to a portion of the last page, retaining all the usual Play-bills, though compressing them in a shorter space. This will be objected to, perhaps, by some of the oldest of our play-going friends, on the plea that their eyes are not so good as when they used to rejoice in the names of Lewis and Bannister; but if they consider the wear and tear which our own eyes undergo in their service, we trust they will not be very angry with us. There is one eye at least, with which a man may see well and handsomely to the last moment of his life, to wit, an eye of consideration. We hope not to trespass on his indulgence for any length of time, as we mean to do our best to have a whole page full of advertisements.

Play-goers. What, Sir, and no play-bills! We'll give up the Paper.

Editor. Do not be so hasty, Gentlemen. We mean in that case to give you a whole page of play-bills as before.

Play-goers. What, Sir, and deprive us of a whole page of other matter! This is worse than the other. It is too bad. It will be impossible to take in the Paper.

Editor. You distress me greatly, Gentlemen, by your impatience. Not a jot of the letter-press will be lost. There will be a great deal more of it.

Play-goers. Yes, in a little miserable type that nobody can read, —a haze of atoms,—an undistinguishable drizzle, like a Scotch mist. We'll have none of it, Sir; we'll have none of it.

Editor. Pray, Gentlemen, hear me out: for the more you say, the more dreadfully we shall have to refute you. Every word that you utter will bring with it a pang of repentance, on account of the exceeding generosity of our intentions. Our design is, in the first place, never to encroach upon the first three pages of the Journal. Secondly, we anticipate no diminution of the type. Thirdly, we hope, in due course of time, to obtain a sufficient quantity of Advertisements, to enable us to increase the size of the Paper; that is to say, to add another leaf or two leaves to it, as it may happen. And finally (and now here comes our generosity, here comes our Christian revenge) in case of our doubling the size of the paper, we mean to ask no more for it than our present magnanimous Two-pence. We do not exactly know where we should put the play-bills in that case; we should be glad, when the promise of the time arrives, to have the opinion of our play-going friends on the subject; but at all events, none of the present matter would be lost: it would probably be much increased; and the Paper would be altogether increased in value to everybody, besides feeling more solid in the hand. As our friends, therefore, (we can see it in their faces), are anxious to make us amends for the little injustice they have been doing us in their thoughts, we hasten to relieve their feelings, by observing, that the more Advertisements they contrive to send or procure for us, the sooner they will be put in possession of those eight beatific pages.

And so, no more at present, upon this part of the subject, from their loving and most forgiving friend.

Advertisements, where there is no lack of other matter, are themselves no unreadable portion of a Journal. Nay, to a curious eye, they give insights into the manners of the times, no less interesting than authentic. Suppose the ancients had possessed a press, and that a volume of a Roman Times or Examiner had been dug up at Herculaneum:—with what curiosity should we not contemplate the millinery of the Roman ladies, or, "Wanted a Gladiator to fight the last new Lion;" or, "Next Ides of November will be published the new poem of Quintus Horatius Flaccus;" or a long account of a Court-day of Nero or Antoninus? In the best editions of the Tatler and Spectator, the Editors have justly preserved a selection of the Advertisements. We subjoin one or two below.

'Never Seen Before.—This day, being the 29th of this instant December (1709), next door to the Grecian's Head Coffee House, over against Cecil street, in the Strand, will be published, for the first time, a Picture finely drawn by an extraordinary master, which has many curious and wonderfully pleasing and surprising motions in it, all natural. It is after the manner of the foreign moving picture, formerly shewn in Fleet street, but with greater variety, and far exceeding that. There needs no more to set it forth; for the picture will speak in itself.'

'Mr Cave Underhill, the famous comedian in the reigns of King Charles II, King William and Queen Mary, and her present Majesty Queen Anne, but now not able to perform so often as heretofore in the playhouse, and having had losses to the value of nearly £2,500, is to have the tragedy of Hamlet acted for his benefit, on Friday, the third of June next, at the Theatre Royal in Drury Lane, in which he is to perform his original part, the Grave-digger.'

'The Perpetual Office of the Charitable Society of single persons in city or country, for raising and assuring money upon marriages, when they pay but sixpence entrance, and two shillings per quarter, till they marry; and whensoever that is, they are secured to receive all their money back, and 150 per cent. clear profit certain, whether full or not, and stand very fair to gain 40 or 50 pounds when full, and may get 1, 2, 3, and £400. The entries daily increase, and the shares of the new married are risen from 48 shillings to above £7. since the last month. The sooner you enter, the more you are like to gain; all which doth more fully appear from the proposals, given gratis, at the said office, at London Stone, in Cannon street.'

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

"The little and short sayings of wise and excellent men are of great value, like the dust of gold, or the least sparks of diamonds."—Tillotson.

A Shirt without Seam.—As an instance of ingenuity in the art of weaving, a shirt wrought in the loom, completely finished and ready for wearing, made about a century ago by an ingenious artisan of this place (Dunfermline) of the name of Inglis, and still preserved in the chest of the corporation of weavers, deserves particular mention. It is without a seam, and, excepting the neck button, was completed without the assistance of the needle. The present author has seen in the possession of Mr Robert Stewart, writer in Edinburgh, a man's shirt similar in all respects to that just noticed, wrought in the loom, by a young man near Dunkeld, of the name of Mac Lauren. What pity that so curious on art should be suffered to remain unknown and unheeded.—Campbell's Tour in Scotland.

Storks, Orthodox and Amatory.—The stork is very generally celebrated for its filial piety, and is in many places held in high veneration for this virtue; but it may not be so generally known, that there is an additional reason for the reverential affection with which it is regarded by the Turks, in the stedfastness with which it adheres to the Mahomedan faith, and rejects all intercourse with Christians. "They build their large nests," says Mr Mac Farlane, "on the mosques, on the minarets, on the Turkish houses; and to them, in their migratory existence, they return year after year; but the dolce nido is never erected on a Christian roof. I have observed in many towns, but particularly in Pergamus, where they are incredibly numerous, that in the Turkish quarter they strut about familiarly, mixing with the people in the streets, affecting the open squares in the Turkish khans, and other places of the greatest resort; but they pass not the boundary of that quarter; they never enter the parts of the town inhabited by the Greeks or Armenians." The same author gives a pleasing picture of these birds as he observed them on the walls of an old Greek church, whose rough ridges, he tells us, were covered with their nests: "They were always divided into pairs; sometimes only the long elastic neck of one of them would be seen towering from the 'procreant cradle,' while the consort would stand by on one of his long slim legs, and watch with the assiduity of affection. Sometimes, one of them caressing his mate, ere he left her, would spread his broad snow-white wings, fly away to the town or fields, and thence return with a large twig or other materials for the nest, or a supply of provisions for his occupied partner. Other couples would be grouped on the edges of the stupendous ruin, entwining their pliant necks and their long bills; or, in pretty coquetry, one would bend her neck over her back, and bury her bill in the luxuriant plumage, like a pretty girl, shunning her lover's kiss but to invite it; and her consort would make his long bill clack, with a peculiar sharp and monotonous sound, and then in gentle force raise the recreant head, and embrace it with quivering delight. I have often counted as many as fifty couple of storks at a time upon the ruins."—Mac Farlane's Constantinople.

FEMALE INGENUITY. — When Robert Macgregor, the eldest son of Rob Roy, was tried at Edinburgh, for what was falsely represented the forcible abduction of a young widow, whom he had afterwards married, his brother James was confined in Edinburgh Castle, as an accomplice in the enterprise. Robert was condemned to death, but James escaped in the following manner:— "Being confined in the Castle of Edinburgh, his daughter had liberty to visit him there, and being in the habit of doing so frequently, she was the less suspected of any design to favour his escape: this, however, she effected with considerable address. Having disguised herself in the dress of a cobler, she caused her father to exchange clothes with her, and feigning to quarrel with the pretended cobler for having brought a pair of shoes but ill mended, she scolded him heartily in the hearing of the sentinels without; while he, muttering his discontent at such rough usage, passed the guards unsuspected, and thus got clear off. The gates of the city were shut as soon as his escape was discovered, yet every search after him proved fruitless."—Campbell's Tour in Scotland.

ANECDOTE OF LORD CHANCELLOR THURLOW.—When it was resolved to deprive Lord Thurlow of the Seals, none of the ministers seemed willing to be the person to demand them, (which it was desirable should be done personally), from the ungracious reception which it was supposed he would meet with. At last Lord Melville was prevailed upon to undertake the task. He adopted the following plan for that purpose. The evening before, he sent a note to the Chancellor, informing him, that he proposed having the honour of breakfasting with his Lordship next day, and that he had "some very particular business to settle with him." On his coming next morning, Lord Thurlow said to him, "I know the business on which you have come. You shall have the bag and seals. There they are," (pointing to a table on which he had placed them) "and there is your breakfast,"—of which they partook very sociably together. Lord Melville said, that he never saw Lord Thurlow in better humour, and they parted apparently very good friends.—Sir John Sinclair's Correspondence.

HUMAN MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.—I recollect seeing in the house of the Duke of Saxe Teschen at Vienna an instrument something in the shape and of the size of an organ, in which the sounds of fifty different musical instruments were united. In Russia I have witnessed a performance which was somewhat the reverse of this, being executed by fifty persons, each of whom was required to give no more than a single note on a species of oboe made of copper. The effect was surprisingly fine. The performers must have spent a great portion of their lives in acquiring the habit of giving their respective notes with so much accuracy. Musical genius must, in such a case, be out of the question; and it is of course only among a class of persons brought up under the habits of passive obedience that men can be made so far to limit the sphere of their faculties as to be converted into mere organised automatons. The effect produced by these extraordinary bands of musical performers, though certainly very perfect, from the incessant practice they have been made to undergo, is not so much more agreeable than that produced by the ordinary mode of performance as to justify such a waste of useful hands in a country so thinly peopled.—Journal of a Nobleman.

TRADITIONAL ANECDOTE OF JAMES V.—Many facetious anecdotes of James V. are still related in this part of the country (Stirling); among others, the following:—James V, a Prince eminent for many good qualities of heart and understanding, was skilled in all the manly exercises of the day, particularly in hunting and hawking. Being once benighted when out a hunting, and separated from his attendants, he happened to enter a cottage in the midst of a moor at the foot of the Ochil hills, near Aloa, where, unknown, he was kindly received, and entertained in the best manner the hospitably-disposed inmates had in their power. In order to regale their unexpected guest, the farmer desired the gudewife to fetch the hen that roosted nearest the cock, which is always the plumpest, best fed, and greatest favourite, for the stranger's supper; which was done with all the good-nature imaginable. The King, highly pleased with his night's lodging, kind, frank reception, and hospitable entertainment, told mine host, at parting, that he should be glad to return his civility, and requested that the first time he came to Stirling, he would call at the castle, and enquire for the gudeman of Ballinguich, a name by which James facetiously distinguished himself when he rambled about the country in disguise. Donaldson, the landlord, did not fail to call on the gudeman of Ballinguich, when his astonishment at finding that the king had been his guest, afforded no small amusement to the merry monarch and his courtiers; and, to carry on the pleasantry, he was thenceforth dignified by James in person with the title of King of the Moors, which name and designation have descended from father to son ever since, and they have continued in possession of the identical spot, the property of Mr Erskine of Mar, till very lately, when this gentleman with reluctance turned out the descendant and representative of the King of the Moors, on account of his majesty's invincible indolence, and great dislike to reform or innovation of any kind, though, from the spirited example of his neighbour tenants on the same estate, he is convinced similar exertion would promote his advantage. So much are some kings wedded to the prejudices of their forefathers.—Campbell's Tour in Scotland.

— In censure, never say the worst, nor ever punish to the uttermost: abate something of extremity, for thy own sake: all offend.—Whichcote.

REMARKABLE PREDICTION PREVIOUS TO THE FIRST FRENCH REVOLUTION.—The Parliaments of France are obliged to conceal the strong spirit of liberty with which they are inflamed, under the mask of loyalty and attachment to the monarchy. They remonstrate with force and elevation against every measure that tends to the prejudice of the provinces they protect: they can go further: but they await the moment to strike the blow that shall lay the fabric of despotism in ruins. When this blow is struck the effects of it will equal those of magic. The cottage will be put on a level with the palace; the peasant with the prince. Ranks shall be confounded; titles, distinction, and birth, shall tumble into an undistinguishable heap of confuson. A new moral creation shall strike the view of an admiring universe; and France, like old Rome, in her first flights to empire, shall appear with the sceptre of universal dominion bourgeoning in her hands. Out of universal confusion order shall arise: the great of Nature's creating will assume their places; and the great, by title and accident, will drop despised into the common mass of people.—Extract from a paper, published in the "Complete Magazine" for October 1764, on the "Causes of the Decline of the French Nation."

A DESPOT INGENIOUSLY ANSWERED.—The following story was current at Constantinople a short time after my arrival. The Sultan sent for a conjuror of repute, to learn from him what would be the result of the war in which he was already engaged with Russia, and of the prospective difficulties of England and France. The conjuror brought into his presence four cocks: each of these cocks he selected to represent a nation: thus, one was England, another France, one Russia, and one Turkey. He placed Turkey in the centre of the kiosk, and then threw England, France, and Russia upon him. But the three cocks, instead of falling upon Turkey, presently began to fight among themselves; the combat was indeed general, but in pairs. Turkey had most bottom; he fought the longest, and remained conqueror of the field, while Russia was severely treated, and had one of his wings broken. The inference was plain,—the Sultan was to be more confident of success than ever,—his army must beat the Muscovites, and the French and English would cry out, "Bravo!" The typical representation might do honour at least to the necromancer's quickness of perception, and knowledge of human nature, under political modifications. The three allies being thrown on Turkey, and then fighting among themselves, is a good idea; and as his object was to flatter, he would have been a fool not to choose the gamest cock of the four for the representative of the Moslemin empire.—Mac Farlane's Constantinople in 1828.

A SINGULAR WAGER.—The Lothian road had been the subject of much speculation long before it was made. At last, however, a gentleman undertook, for an inconsiderable wager, to make this piece of road, about a quarter of a mile in length, and in many parts, twenty paces in breadth, so far passable, with one day's labour, as that he might drive over it in safety with his carriage; which, to the surprise of all who had heard of, or witnessed this whimsical undertaking, he accomplished; and thus gained his bet. The difficulties to be surmounted in this arduous attempt, were various and intricate. The line of road was almost straight, and lay through fields, orchards, gardens, and a multiplicity of small houses. Lest any one, therefore, whose property in this direction might suffer injury, when removing obstructions, should take the alarm, and make application for legal means, which would at least retard, if not prevent such unusual and summary procedure, it was necessary to be secret and expeditious. Accordingly, matters were concerted with address, and executed with promptitude. It happened to be winter, when the labouring poor in general are out of employ; and a day's work now and then is all they have to depend on for a precarious and scanty subsistence; of course a sufficient number of hands were easily procured, and at no great expence. Many hundreds appeared on the ground at sunrise on this eventful day—a day of much mirth to some, while others had cause sufficient to lament the ravages of a few hours. Parties filed off to various occupations; some to demolish houses; others to pull down dikes; some to root up hedges; others to cut down trees: in short, this ruthless band continued their depredations with unwearied assiduity; and before the fall of night they had accomplished their business of destruction, as was then the opinion of some persons: but it evidently appears now to have been productive of great utility. Among the many scenes of temporary distress which this unexpected invasion occasioned, that experienced by a simple old milk-woman is supposed to have been one of the most ludicrous incidents of the day. Long before day-light, the good, easy soul, had milked her cows, her pipe smoked, and tea taken, all things were in readiness for her departure to serve her customers; but recollecting that a few friends were to eat some sheep's-head broth with her at mid-day, she, with great composure, prepared the kail-pot, put in the accustomed ingredients, and left it on the fire, so that it might simmer undisturbed, till she should, on her return, cook it leisurely to her satifaction. Judge of the surprise and disappointment, however; on her return, neither pot, nor fire, neither house, byre, nor cows were in the places where she had left them; for all had suffered a material and radical change; having been swept away in the general wreck.—Campbell's Tour in Scotland.

AN AUKWARD QUESTION.—One of the Directors of the French India Company, one day asked Bourdonnais, how it was that he had so ill-managed the affairs of the company, when he had managed his own so well. "It is," replied he, "because I have conducted my own affairs according to my own judgment, those of the company according to your instructions."—Esprit de G. T. Raynal.

DOCTORS UNDER DIFFERENT PHASES.—Mr Mac Farlane in his Constantinople in 1828, &c. gives two anecdotes of medical professors, which are strikingly characteristic of a man without a heart, and a man with one. The first is of a poor Turk, who being accidentally wounded by a pistol shot, applied to a Christian doctor to extract the ball. Having failed to do this, the surgeon proposes to make up a salve for the man's immediate relief, and to take out the ball in the morning. The salve was quickly made, but the Christian refused to deliver it until he had received payment; the poor man and his companions had not money enough; payment was promised in the money, but not an hour's credit could be obtained, and after some time the wounded man delivered up to the surgeon his yataghan as a security. "If I were not to act in this manner," said the doctor to the British traveller, "I should have my shop emptied in a day, and not get a paro for my medicines." Unequal to the extraction of the ball, the doctor called in the assistance of an Italian; the two together made a hard bargain with the wounded man, and it was agreed that fifty piasters were to be delivered to them upon "receipt of the ball from their hands." The Italian also failed in his first attempt, and the next day was appointed to repeat the operation; but it happened that the Turk, in the restlessness of pain, had thrown the ball so near to the orifice of the wound, that one of his friends was enabled to remove it; and thus the two crafty surgeons, who had so cautiously made their bargain beforehand, were entitled to no payment whatever, and had no resource or consolation but in quarrelling with each other. The second anecdote is a more pleasing one: Mr Mac Farlane was walking with another doctor, a Neapolitan, when a poor woman rushed from a Turkish hovel, and wildly thrust a sick child into the doctor's hands, anxiously asking his opinion. The Neapolitan gave her hope that the child might be saved, and bade the woman send to his house for some medicines: "These poor creatures," said he, in reply to the observation of his companion, "generally find some way of showing their gratitude, either by little presents of game, or fowls, or some other eatable: or by rendering occasionally personal services, which is much the same to us as money."

DRURY-LANE.—Hypocrite.—Deaf as a Post.—And Masaniello.

COVENT-GARDEN.—Much Ado About Nothing.—And Romance of a Day.

IN default of having a play to criticise, we lay before the reader the following clever and courteous notice of our remarks upon Mr GREEN:—

TO THE TATLER.

'DEAR TATLER,—Knowing that your love of truth and justice is stronger than your regard for your own opinion, notwithstanding it so greatly deserves your confidence, since your readers (and myself among the number) put almost implicit faith in it; I am induced to intercede for a re-consideration of your opinion of the acting of Mr Green, at the Queen's Theatre. I was one of the audience who enjoyed the new comic piece Delusions last evening, and heartily joined in the applauses bestowed upon it. I must also confess myself to have been one of those who hissed on the occasion of the ill-timed attempt to gain applause for a certain great name by a clap-trap; for I could not help feeling that the recollection of a great military reputation and services was not to be thrust upon an audience with impunity, for the purpose of eliciting applause, at this juncture, when the great name in question is a rallying point for a factious and interested opposition to the just demands of the nation, temperately made, and firmly persisted in; and which the good feeling of the King, and the prudence of his Ministers, see fit to concede. But to my purpose.

'I consider that I was only one of many who attributed the great success of the clever and "compact" comedietta, Delusions, to the lively and agreeable acting of Mr Green. In support of this opinion, I would urge the favourable impression produced by his person, dress, and manner; the latter, easy and gentlemanlike, free from anything like affectation, presumption, or impertinence, and frank and natural withal. To perfect self-possession and freedom from restraint also, he adds a good understanding of his part, the outlines of which he fills up with efficient and appropriate bye-play. Let me recall to your recollection the quiet relish with which he enjoyed his happy state,—what a lively picture he presented of bachelor's happiness: he looked a man "of most blessed conditions." Then how gradually alarm at the report of his lawyer's having absconded took possession of his mind; how naturally were chagrin and trepidation mingled with his endeavours to discredit it, and to laugh off the effect: how natural the action of biting his fingers as he conned over the paragraph: how really nervous, restless, and hurried his movements and manner. I will not occupy your time by going through the performance, to point out the effective points; but content myself with reminding you how little there was exceptionable, and how much there was good in it. Allow me to suggest, that its unostentatious excellence and completeness may have led you to look for the development of higher qualities, and more brilliant points in the acting, than the slight part itself was susceptible of: or that you may have forgotten the stage on which he was acting; or do you apply the highest standard to a meritorious performance, whether it is exhibited on the boards of a minor or of a large theatre? My object in troubling you with this communication is to prevent your opinion having the effect of producing a disparaging impression upon those who do not estimate the ability of actors by so high a standard as yourself, or who have not the nicety of perception and delicacy of discrimination which you evince in forming your critical judgment of a performer's merits.

'May I be permitted also to submit for your consideration, the fact of the late Mr Hazlitt having entertained a not merely favourable, but high opinion of Mr Green's talents as an actor? I must beg to assure you that I heard of this latter circumstance incidentally, after I had received the favourable impression produced on my mind by the first sight of this actor's performance; and, further, that I have knowledge of Mr Green but from having seen him act twice.

'With high respect for your opinion, and esteem for your liberality of feeling (to which I fear I have too much need to appeal) I subscribe myself,

'Dear Tatler, your Constant Reader,

'March 11th, 1831. 'A PLAY-GOER.'

It is possible that we may have been led to undervalue Mr GREEN's acting, in consequence of opinions of a reverse nature, which we had heard before we saw him. And yet we are jealous of any tendency of this sort in ourselves. Upon reconsidering what we have said, we can find no reason at present to alter our judgment. Our standard of acting, we allow, is a high one; but we are not in the habit of applying it to theatres of minor pretension; though we may have involuntarily subjected Mr GREEN to something like it, after what we had heard. It is an acute suggestion of our Correspondent, that the "unostentatious excellence and completeness" of Mr GREEN's performance in the new piece may have led us "to look for the development of higher qualities, and more brilliant points in the acting than the part itself was susceptible of:" but not to mention that the part itself was susceptible enough of anything that a good actor could mix up with it, the style of Mr GREEN does not appear to us to be free from ostentation; or if that be too grave a word, from a display of petty resources. He substitutes stage-trick and manœuvre, for the real stuff of the character he is performing. He does not so much enjoy the part itself, as the consciousness of performing it. The mechanism and clock-work of the actor's business is brought too much before us. For instance, that very circumstance of biting his fingers, which our correspondent praises, and which is praise-worthy enough as something en passant, was carried to an extent in the performance of Thursday night, which shewed that with Mr GREEN it was a main point of resource, a staple commodity. His nods and winks he could not have enough of. And there was an action in particular, which was offensive from its current recurrence, and from the trick thus mixed up with its would-be restlessness; and that was, a repeated cribbing hither and thither with his feet sideways, which he evidently thinks a piece of sensitive grace. Add to this the way in which he stuck himself to and fro with stiff knees, rather than walked; and though we grant he is ingenious and clever, and has a certain air with him, we must see more of him, and more to his advantage (as perhaps Mr HAZLITT did) before we can get rid of an impression that his style challenges more attention than it can warrant. Probably he has been hurt by being the favourite of some inferior stage.

With regard to the clap-trap for the Duke of WELLINGTON, we have received a letter, which informs us that there was no such intention on the part of the author of this very pleasant piece, and that the unseasonable passage has been altered.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

TUESDAY, MARCH 15, 1831.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

Journal of a Nobleman; comprising an Account of his Travels, and a Narrative of his Residence at Vienna during the Congress. Two volumes, 8vo. Colburn and Bentley.

We extract from this book a singular story.

'One of the places we were most anxious to visit in this part of Russia was the town of Toulchin, the capital, if I may so call it, of the vast domains possessed by the head of the family of Potocki. That opulent and formerly powerful house was, at the period of my visit there, represented by a woman, the Countess Sophia Potocka, the history of whose life had given her even more celebrity in this part of Europe than her immense riches. Madame Potocka was at that time not far from her fiftieth year. She had, however, by no means yet lost any of her freshness and vigour, and she was, in every respect, entitled to the reputation of being a very beautiful woman. Her figure was tall, commanding, graceful, and extremely well formed, and there was an unaffected dignity in her deportment which kept familiarity within the proper limits of good breeding. Her features were extremely well-formed; her large black eyes full of expression and vivacity; and an agreeable smile often played upon her lips, which occasionally uncovered a most beautiful set of teeth.

'The Countess Potocka was a native of Constantinople, where her father, a reputed descendant of the Cantacuzene family, followed the humble calling of a butcher. In spite of industry and activity, he found great difficulty in earning a sufficiency to pay his way, and maintain his wife and his only daughter, Sophia. The latter had just entered her fourteenth year, and her growing beauty was the admiration of the whole neighbourhood.

'Fate ordained that the poor butcher should suffer repeated losses, which reduced him to a condition bordering on beggary. His wife unfolded her distressed circumstances to a Greek, one of her relations, who was dragoman to the French embassy, and who, in his turn, related the story to the Marquis de Vauban, the ambassador. This nobleman became interested for the unfortunate family, and especially for Sophia, whom the officious dragoman described as being likely to fall into the snares that were laid for her, and to become an inmate of the harem of some pasha, or even of a Turk of inferior rank. Prompted by pity, curiosity, or perhaps by some other motive, the ambassador paid a visit to the distressed family. He saw Sophia, was charmed by her beauty and intelligence, and he proposed that her parents should place her under his care, and allow him to convey her to France. The misery to which the poor people were reduced may perhaps palliate the shame of acceding to this extraordinary proposition; but, be this as it may, they consented to surrender up their daughter for the sum of 1500 piastres, and Sophia was that same day conducted to the ambassador's palace. She found in the Marquis de Vauban a kind and liberal benefactor. He engaged masters to instruct her in every branch of education; and elegant accomplishments, added to her natural charms, rendered her an object of irresistible attraction.

'In the course of a few months the ambassador was called home; and he set out, accompanied by his oriental treasure, to travel to France by land. To diminish as far as possible the fatigue of the long journey; they proceeded by short stages; and having passed through European Turkey, they arrived at Kaminieck in Podolia, which is the first fortress belonging to Russia. Here the Marquis determined to rest for a short time before undertaking the remainder of his tedious journey.

'Count de Witt, a descendant of the grand-pensionary of Holland, who was governor of the place, received his noble visitor with every mark of attention. The Count, however, no sooner beheld Sophia than he became deeply enamoured of her; and on learning the equivocal situation in which she stood, being neither a slave nor a mistress, but, as it were, a piece of merchandize purchased for 1500 piastres, he wound up his declaration of love by an offer of marriage. The Count was a handsome man, scarcely thirty years of age, a Lieutenant-General in the Russian service, and enjoying the high favour of his sovereign, Catherine II. The fair Greek, as may well be imagined, did not reject this favour of fortune, but accepted the offer of her suitor without hesitation.

'It was easy to foresee that the Marquis de Vauban would not be very willing to part with a prize which he regarded as lawfully acquired, and to which he attached no small value. The Count therefore found it advisable to resort to stratagem. Accordingly, his Excellency having one day taken a ride beyond the ramparts, the draw-bridges were raised, and the lovers repaired to church, and their hands were joined by a papa [a Greek priest]. When the Marquis appeared at the gates of the fortress and demanded admittance, a messenger was sent out to inform him of what had happened; and, to complete the dénouement of the comedy, the marriage contract was exhibited to him in due form.

'To save Sophia from the reproaches which her precipitancy, it may perhaps be said her ingratitude, would have fully justified, the Count directed the ambassador's suite to pack up their baggage, and join his Excellency extra muros. The poor Marquis soon discovered that it was quite useless to stay where he was, for the purpose of venting threats and complaints; and he had no hope that the court of France would think it worth while to go to war for the sake of avenging his affront. He therefore prudently took a hint from one of the French poets, who says,—

"Le bruit est pour le fat, la plainte pour le sot, L'honnête homme trompé, s'éloigne, et ne dit mot:"

and he set off, doubtless with the secret determination never again to traffic in merchandise which possesses no value when it can be either bought or sold.

'About two years after his marriage, the Count de Witt obtained leave of absence, and, accompanied by his wife, he visited the different courts of Europe. Sophia's beauty, which derived piquancy from a certain oriental languishment of manner, was everywhere the theme of admiration. The Prince de Ligne, who saw her at the court of France, mentions her in his Memoirs in terms of eulogy which I cannot think exaggerated; for when I knew her at Toulchin, her charms retained all their lustre, and she outshone the young beauties of the court, amidst whom she appeared like Calypso surrounded by her nymphs.

'The second period of Sophia's life forms a sequel perfectly in unison with the commencement. Count Felix Potocki, at the beginning of the troubles in Poland, raised a considerable party by the influence of his rank and vast fortune. During a temporary absence from the court of Poland, he made a tour through Italy, and on his return he met the Count and Countess De Witt at Hamburgh, when he fell deeply in love with Sophia.

'Nothing is so easy as to obtain a divorce in Poland. The law extends so far on this point, that I knew a gentleman who had no less than four wives, all living and bearing his name. The motives of parties suing for a divorce are never inquired into, nor is the act itself considered as implying improper conduct on either side. The love of diversity is in most cases the cause of the wished-for separation. Count Potocki therefore availing himself of the advantage afforded by the Polish law of divorce, and having previously made every necessary arrangement, one morning called on Count de Witt, and without further ceremony said, "Count, I love your wife, and I cannot live without her. I know that I am not indifferent to her, and I might immediately carry her off; but I wish to owe my happiness to you, and to retain for ever a grateful sense of your generosity. Here are two papers: one is an act of divorce, which only wants your signature, for you see the Countess has already affixed hers to it; the other is a bond for two millions of florins, payable at my banker's in this city. We may therefore settle the business amicably or otherwise, just as you please!" The husband doubtless thought of his adventure at the fortress of Kaminieck, and, like the French ambassador, he resigned himself to his fate and signed the paper. The fair Sophia became that same day Countess Potocki; and to the charms of beauty and talent were now added the attractions of a fortune, the amount of which was unequalled in Europe.

'She was received at court as a matter of course, and, through her amiable manners and rank, soon became the leader of the ton among the Polish nobility. At his death the Count Potocki made her the sole and absolute disposer of the whole of his immense property. She had a son by the Count de Witt, the same of whom mention has been made in the third chapter, and several children by the Count Potocki, who were all very young at the time of their father's death. When I became acquainted with this interesting family, the eldest was not more than eighteen years of age. The Countess had bestowed the greatest care on the education of her children. Although herself originally brought up in a manner which would not have qualified her for the superintendence of the education of others, her mind had subsequently been cultivated under the guidance and tuition of her first friend, the ambassador, who taught her to read and write many languages correctly, and laid the foundation of acquirements not commonly possessed even by the best educated ladies in Poland.

'After the death of her first husband, the Countess Potocka took charge of the son she had had by him, and brought him up with her other children.'

TO THE TATLER.

Mr Tatler,—Your remarks on the "Musical Performances" of Wednesday last do you infinite credit, and I am happy to respond to the sentiments they contain. As I said before in a former communication, they are just and impartial, two important, but often neglected, attributes of criticism. By pursuing this independent course, your Journal cannot fail to be palatable to all parties. By the bye this smacks somewhat of flattery; but I beg to renounce so unworthy a claim to your favour, which I trust would be rejected by you as undeserving of notice. My attendance at these "Selections" has given rise to a query in my mind, which I should be glad if you or some of your correspondents would answer. There appears to be a system of "exclusiveness" at these "Selections," which I cannot understand. In all the "programmes," that I have seen, Mrs Waylett's name is ushered in thus prominently and parenthetically. Air—"Stand so," (composed expressly for her.) Why this should be so pointedly and unequivocally introduced, I cannot conceive. Is there no other fair warbler worthy of having airs and pretty little ditties composed expressly for her? or is there no one else deserving of so distinguished an honour? I am not going to call in question this lady's talents in this particular department, far from it: she is extremely capable of executing the airs composed for her; but she has her faults, and I think I could point them out, but it would be foreign to my purpose at this moment. Such marked distinctions, however, are in bad taste, and cannot fail to "offend to the soul" all who dislike monopoly:—"it is putting one sadly over the head of another," as my uncle Toby says. These cursory remarks are made without any acrimonious or party feeling; but a solution will oblige your constant reader,

March 11th. PHILO-DRAMATICUS.

[We confess we do not enter into the objection of our Correspondent. An air "written expressly" for a singer, surely does not imply any slight upon another, but simply that it is a composition of a nature suitable to the peculiar powers of the singer (whatever those may be), and that being written to suit them, it is likely to call them forth in a popular manner. We are not to conclude from this, that any superiority is claimed for the singer above all others,—above Miss Paton for instance,—though there may be no song in the bill expressly written for that lady. Nor are we to suppose that other singers, of whatsoever rank, may not have a song expressly written for them, provided they are popular.]

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

"The little and short sayings of wise and excellent men are of great value, like the dust of gold, or the least sparks of diamonds."—Tillotson.

Wisdom Shut Out by Self-sufficiency.—It is one of the hardest things in nature to make any man as wise as he should be, who imagines himself wise enough already.—Quevedo.

— In many cases it is very hard to fix the bounds of good and evil, because these part, as day and night, which are separated by twilight.—Whichcote.

A puzzling Conjecture.—It would be a difficult question to resolve, whether formality did most mischief by creeping into Law or Physic: whether she has committed most devastation under the lawyer's gown or under the physician's broad-brimmed hat; and whether she has ruined more people in the one, than she has killed in the other.—Montesquieu.

An Enlightening Question.—Diagoras being on board a ship in a terrible storm, in the height of it they told him they well deserved what they suffered for taking such an impious wretch as he was on board. He replied, "Behold the great number of vessels that are in the same tempest with ours; do you think that I am also in every one of those ships?" This should teach the faithful and the orthodox not to urge all sorts of unbelievers with the reasons which are drawn from the common course of Providence.—Bayle.

Phenomena of History.—The martyrdom of the Eleven Thousand Virgins is placed by some writers about the end of the fourth century. When Conan, say they, with eleven thousand British warriors, in the service of the Emperor Maximus, (or of Constantine Tyran) conquered Armorica, and founded the kingdom of Little Britain, or Brittany, the Emperor, to reward his valour, sent to demand from Dionotus, King of Cornwall, as many virgins as would suffice to wive the whole body. Dionotus, accordingly, despatched his daughter Ursula, and eleven thousand of the élite of the British virginity in this laudable enterprise; but the fair adventurers being cast on shore by a tempest among the Huns and Picts, and declining to receive their hands in substitution for those of their countrymen, were mercilessly sent to heaven by the ruffians, with the double crown of virginity and martyrdom. This story has puzzled everybody, but those of the learned society of Sorbonne, who chose Saint Ursula for their patroness. Cornwall is no doubt better peopled now than it was then; and if it possesses to-day eleven thousand handsome and marriageable virgins, all that can be said is, that it is a great shame.—Notes to Ritchie's Romance of History.

Macduff's Cave.—There is a magnificent excavation in the face of Rincraig rocks, which is called Macduff's Cave; it lies about a quarter of a mile westward of Ely, at a place called Earl's ferry, from the circumstance, as it is said, of Macduff, who had made the cave a place of refuge, having made his escape thence to the other side of the Frith of Forth. He landed at North Berwick, whence he proceeded directly to the murdered king's son, Malcolm, then in England. Hence tradition mentions, originated a peculiar privilege which criminals claim, namely, that of being ferried over instantly when demanded, without any one being suffered to pursue them, till half over the Frith, in their passage to the other side,—Macduff having obtained this privilege from the king, in commemoration of his escape from the blood-thirsty usurper. This privilege, it is said, was claimed, and granted, in the case of Carnegie, and Douglas of Fitzhaven.—Campbell's Tour in Scotland.

Untimely Speculations.—M. Chirac, first physician to the Regent Duc d'Orleans, who was deeply interested in the Mississippi System, was on his way to a female patient, when hearing it rumoured that a fall in actions (shares) had taken place, he was so much lost in thought on entering the chamber of the sick lady, that while he held her arm, in the act of feeling her pulse, he exclaimed, in seeming agitation, "O good God! it falls!" Alarmed at this unlooked for and unexpected crisis, the poor patient sprung up, and began to ring the bell with great emotion, calling out in the agony of apprehension, "I am gone! oh, I am a dead woman!" The physician, recovering from his reverie, quieted the fears of the distracted lady by telling her it was the actions, the precious actions, that were falling, not her pulse; for that he had never felt it beat more full, regular, and soft, in the whole course of his practice. —Campbell's Tour in Scotland.—[A similar anecdote has been related of a Scotch physician, who was fond of farming. The lady, however, did not undergo so serious an alarm. The Doctor only replied to her question—"What shall I do with my head?"—"I shall plant it with potatoes;" a resolution which the patient might naturally think not likely to be acted upon, without her consent.]

A Turkish Legend.—The tower from which Mr Burford took the panorama of Constantinople, called by the Franks the Tower of Leander, and by the Turks, the Tower of the Maiden, is connected with the following legend:—It was predicted to one of the Sultans, that his fairest, his favourite daughter, then a child, should be stung to death by a serpent. To avoid this catastrophe, he caused a tower to be built upon a small rock, in the midst of the rapid Bosphorus, and placed his darling in it, as a place secure even in the teeth of a prophecy. The tower almost covered the face of the rock, which, devoid of a blade of vegetation, save the sea-weed that grew at its roots, and washed by the deep waves, could not harbour a venomous reptile; but just as the peerless Sultana had attained the perfection of her charms, and was dearer to her doating father than ever, an asp, a tiny asp (such mayhap as Cleopatra sought) was conveyed to the imperial maiden of the tower, in a basket of delicious fruit. It bit her: she died. The prophecy was fulfilled; the tale ended in a manner consonant to Turkish philosophy—"Who can escape what destiny has decreed?" and the place was ever after called Kiz-Koulessi, or the Tower of the Maiden.—Mac Farlane's Constantinople.

The Two Kings.—James the Fifth, a very social debonair prince, residing at Stirling, in Buchanan of Arnpryor's time, carriers were frequently passing along the common road, near Arnpryor's house, with necessaries for the use of the King's family; and he, having some extraordinary occasion, ordered one of these carriers to leave his load at his house, and he would pay him for it; which the carrier refused to do, saying he was the king's carrier, and his load was for his Majesty's use; to which Arnpryor seemed to have small regard, compelling the carrier to leave his load, and telling him, if James was King of Scotland, he was King of Kippen, so that it was reasonable he should share with his neighbour king in some of the loads so frequently carried that road. The carrier representing this usage, and telling the story to some of the king's servants, it came at length to his Majesty's ears, who shortly after, with a few attendants, came to visit his neighbour king, who happened to be at dinner. King James having sent a servant to demand access, was denied the same by a tall fellow with a battle-axe, who stood porter at the gate, telling him there could be no access till dinner was over. This answer not satisfying the king, he sent to demand access a second time; upon which he was desired by the porter to desist, otherwise he would find cause to repent of his rudeness. His Majesty, finding this method would not do, desired the porter to tell his master that the gude man of Ballinguich (the name which the king bore when he wandered about the country in disguise, and which, it seems, was known to Arnpryor) desired to speak with the King of Kippen. The porter telling this to Arnpryor, he in all humble manner came and received the king, and having entertained him with much sumptuousness and jollity, became so agreeable to King James, that he allowed him to take as much of any provision he found carrying that road as he had occasion for; and seeing he made the first visit, desired Arnpryor, in a few days, to return it at Stirling; which he performed, and continued in very much favour with the king, always thereafter being termed King of Kippen while he lived.—Campbell's Tour in Scotland (from Buchanan of Achmar.)

An Extraordinary Rescue.—A peasant with his wife and three children, had taken up his summer quarters in a châlet, and was depasturing his flocks on one of the rich Alps which overhang the Durance. The oldest boy was an idiot, about eight years of age, the second was five years old and dumb, and the youngest was an infant. It so happened that the infant was left one morning in charge of his brothers, and the three had rambled to some distance from the châlet before they were missed. When the mother went in search of the little wanderers, she found the two elder, but could discover no traces of the baby. The idiot boy seemed to be in a transport of joy, while the dumb child displayed every symptom of alarm and terror. In vain did the terrified parent endeavour to collect what had become of the lost infant. The antics of the one and the fright of the other explained nothing. The dumb boy was almost bereft of his senses, while the idiot appeared to have acquired an unusual degree of mirth and expression. He danced about, laughed, and made gesticulations, as if he were imitating the action of one who had caught up something of which he was fond, and hugged it to his heart. This, however, was some slight comfort to the poor woman, for she imagined that some acquaintance had fallen in with the children, and had taken away the infant. But the day and night wore away, and no tidings of the lost child. On the morrow, when the parents were pursuing their search, an eagle flew over their heads, at sight of which, the idiot renewed his antics, and the dumb brother clung to his father with shrieks of anguish and affright. The horrible truth then burst upon their minds, that the miserable infant had been carried off in the talons of a bird of prey:—and that the half-witted elder brother was delighted at his riddance of an object of whom he was jealous. On the morning in which the accident happened, an Alpen yager had been watching near an eagle's nest, under the hope of shooting the bird on her return to her eyrie. After waiting in all the anxious perseverance of a true sportsman, he beheld the monster slowly winging her way towards the rock, behind which he was concealed. Imagine his horror, when, upon her nearer approach, he heard the cries and distinguished the figure of an infant in her fatal grasp. In an instant his resolution was formed,—to fire at the bird at all hazards, the moment she should alight upon her nest, and rather to kill the child, than leave it to be torn to pieces by the horrid devourer. With a silent prayer, and a steady aim, the mountaineer poised his rifle. The ball went directly through the head or heart of the eagle, and in a minute afterwards, this gallant hunter of the Alps had the unutterable delight of snatching the child from the nest, and bearing it away in triumph. It was dreadfully wounded by the eagle's talons, in one of its arms and sides, but not mortally; and within twenty-four hours after it was first missed, he had the satisfaction of restoring it to its mother's arms. —Gilly's Waldensian Researches.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

Drury-Lane.—Macbeth.—And the Devil's Brother.

Covent-Garden.—Fazio.—Married Lovers.—And Robert the Devil.

Drury Lane.

Macbeth was performed here last night,—the principal character by Mr Macready; Lady Macbeth by Miss Huddart. We are loth to find fault with one who gives us so much pleasure as Mr Macready; but his Macbeth is not one of his most effective performmaces. It wants the poetry of the original; that is to say, it wants in its general style and aspect that grace and exaltation which is to the character what the poetry is to the language; which, in fact is the poetry of the tragedy; and which, without depriving it of its nature, enables the tragic criminal to move fitly in the supernatural sphere of his error. In other words, the passion of Mr Macready's Macbeth wants imagination. There is the same defect in it, but in a greater degree, as was observable in his King John. It wants the Royal warrant. We do not mean the mouthing and strut of the ordinary stage King; which are things that Mr Macready is above; but that habitual consciousness of ascendancy, and disposition to throw an ideal grace over its reflections, whether pleasurable or painful, which enables the character to present itself to us as an object of intellectual and moral contemplation, with whatsoever infirmities it may be accompanied. Now the Macbeth of Mr Macready, before he commits the murder, is (so to speak) nothing but a misgiving anticipator of crime; and after it, nothing but the misgiving or despairing perpetrator. He has no golden thoughts in him, before or after; no morning hopes, nor sad beams of evening:—not a leaf is gilded by a ray. Whereas, however weak and unhappy a character Macbeth is, he cannot talk as he does, and vent the poetical images with which his mind is graced, without shewing that there is a divinity within him, though an enfeebled one, and though at once ashamed, and angered, and over-awed by the intrusion of some monstrous stranger. The very first words Macbeth utters, when he comes on the stage, shew the natural vivacity of his character, and its tendency to be divided in its feelings; and the way in which these were spoken by Mr Macready did not augur well for his performance.

"So foul and fair a day I have not seen,"— says the good-humoured conquering general, looking cheerily up at the sky, and playing, as it were, with the harmless struggle of the elements. Mr Macready delivered the words like a mere commonplace. So when he says, in the third act (in that beautiful picturesque passage)

"Light thickens; and the crow Makes wing to the rooky wood,"

he spoke these words, as merely intimating a fact,—a note of time,—pointing with his hand as he did it, and as he might have pointed to a clock, to convince his witness of the truth of what he was saying. And again, in what follows,

"Good things of day begin to droop and drowse, While night's black agents to their prey do rouse."

This was spoken with too much rapidity and indifference, as a fact, and not with the solemnity required by the reflection of a man in a melancholy state of mind, at once aggravating and exalting his melancholy by it. Mr Macready seems afraid of the poetry of some of his greatest parts, as if it would hurt the effect of his naturalness and his more familiar passages: but such a fear is not a help towards nature; it is only an impulse towards avoiding a difficulty. The highest union of the imaginative with the passive is the highest triumph of acting, as it is of writing. It is this which has made Mr Kean so surpassing an actor. He always gives you the grace and the nature too,—the ideal with the common,—the charm of the thought with the energy of the passion. Mr Macready, who is a fine actor when he is at his best, is most graceful and ideal, when he is moved by domestic tenderness. He is best in the pain which seems to have a right to take pity on itself; which may complain justly, and shed honourable tears, and has a right to combine manliness and softness. He cannot so well fetch out "the soul of goodness in things evil." Violent or criminal pains he makes simply violent and criminal. Nothing remains to him, if his self-respect, in the ordinary sense of the word, is lost. In the rest, he is often admirable.

Miss Huddart's Lady Macbeth is liable to the same charge of a want of the poetical. This lady has force, and often a lively conception of the natural; which is apt to be spoilt by a singular want of command over her tones; so that a passage which begins as if it would charm you, shall sometimes become awkward and almost ridiculous before it concludes. But in acting the highest parts of the drama, she is at a great disadvantage with those who recollect Mrs Siddons. Imperiousness appears to be substituted for dignity; a loud demand for the secure triumph of natural elevation. Miss Huddart's Lady Macbeth wants the brighter part of the blood,—that which makes it able to bear the darker, and to carry us along with it by dint of something joyous in its very enormity. She is too much like an ordinary instigator and abettor; not like one carried away by the thrilling idea of a crown about her temples. A single instance will suffice. When Lady Macbeth, in her anticipations of royalty, apostrophizes her absent husband, and tells him she wishes she had him with her on the spot, in order that she might set aside, in his thoughts,

"All that impedes him from the golden round,"

Miss Huddart says this in an ordinary, wishful manner, not without fervour, but with no particular marking of the extreme sanguineness of the desire, and all which it implies. Mrs Siddons used to elevate her stature, to smile with a lofty and uncontrollable expectation, and, with an arm raised beautifully in the air, to draw the very circle she was speaking of, in the air about her head, as if she ran her finger round the gold. ☞

(Final Extract.)

We had prepared, and printed, another article to head our paper of this day; but as it was of a nature rarely to be met with, and had reference to an interesting subject about to be discussed in Parliament, we thought it better, though at a later hour, to keep it for that occasion.]

The Highest Mountains in the World.—Until the journeys of Mr Webb and of Mr Moorcroft, the attention of the enquiring world had never been drawn to the stupendous height of the Himalyeh mountains. The great elevation which these travellers were sensible they had reached above the plains of India, and the immense ranges of snowy mountains which they still saw before them rising one above another, struck them with deep astonishment, and led them to suppose that the snowy pinnacles of the Himalyeh might at least rival in height the colossal summits of the Andes. Measurements had been made by Colonel Crawford, in 1802, which, though not published at that time, were known to the scientific world, and made them, for the first time, acquainted with this great mountain range. Observations made by Colonel Colebrook, from the plains of Rohilcund, 144 miles distant from the mountains, gave them an elevation of nearly 22,000 feet; but timidity, rather than exaggeration, appears to have mingled with and modified these calculations. Lieutenant Webb, in his journey towards the source of the Ganges, made several observations on the remarkable peak called Jamunavatari, near the source of the Jumna, which stands conspicuous in the foremost range of the Himalyeh. The result of his observations gave Jamunavatari a height of 20,000 feet above the table-land on which he stood, and which he estimated to be at least 5000 feet above the plains. As all these calculations, however, seemed too vague and imperfect to satisfy the critical, he was determined to measure, with the utmost accuracy of mathematical science, the height of some conspicuous peak, and so Dewalagiri, or the White Mountain, was selected for this purpose. Elaborate measurements, made from the plain of Gorakhpur, gave this mountain an absolute elevation of 27,550 feet.

The testimony of all the travellers who visited the Himalyeh corroborated the inferences derived from these scientific observations. The immense ranges which they saw rising successively one above the other impressed them more strongly with the belief of the great height of these mountains than could have been produced, perhaps, by the sublime spectacle of an isolated peak rising at once from the sea and towering above the clouds. Colonel Kirkpatrick, in describing the mountain scenery of Nepaul, itself an elevated land, observes that the first range of mountains, though absolutely lofty, yet appear but hills compared with the great mountains that rise behind them. One of these, Sheoopoorah, was supposed to rise 4000 feet above the valley; farther back, however, Mount Jibjibia, clothed nearly to its summit with pendulous forests, still rose 6000 feet higher; but these great mountains sunk into hills of no importance when compared with the mighty barrier of snowy mountains which terminated the prospect. These were supposed to be at least 20,000 feet above the valley, which is itself 4000 feet above the sea. This conjectural estimation was confirmed by mathematical observation made by Colonel Crawford of eight conspicuous peaks, which were found to range from 15,000 to 24,000 feet above the level of the sea. But these lofty mountains all yield the pre-eminence to the mighty peak of Chumulary, which stands on the frontiers of Bootan and Thibet. This great sovereign of the Indian mountains is supposed, from the great distance at which it is visible in the plains of India, to be not less than 30,000 feet in height.

Notwithstanding all these observations having the aid of mathematical precision, doubts were still entertained respecting the elevation of the Himalyeh mountains. The learned were slow to acknowledge the accuracy of calculations which were liable to be influenced by the natural proneness of the human mind to yield itself up implicitly to whatever is subilme and wonderful. It was objected, that the line of perpetual snow, according to the accounts of travellers in the Himalyeh, was at too great a height above the valleys to render it likely that the latter had so great an elevation as was assigned to them: it was supposed that the limit of perpetual snow in those climates ought to be at the height of about 13,000 feet above the sea; and this principle but ill accorded with the height assigned to mountains in the Himalyeh, richly covered with forests of gigantic pines. But it was certainly inverting the proper order of philosophical reasoning to judge peremptorily of observations by supposed laws of nature, instead of endeavouring to discover those laws from observations. Half a century ago, measurements of height made with barometers were considered much too erroneous to be relied on, and a preference was given to the measurement of angles; but in this case the latter mode of observation was not thought satisfactory, and recourse was had to the barometer. In a second journey, Mr Webb proceeded to the Niti Ghaut, the height of which he ascertained, by barometrical measurement, to be 16,814 feet. This is perhaps the highest mountain pass in the world; yet there was no snow here, nor on the cliffs 300 feet above it; and Mr Webb confirmed the accounts of Mr Moorcroft respecting the noble forests of pines, mingled with cypresses and cedars, which clothed those lofty ridges on which the human being finds it difficult to respire. The high limits of perpetual snow on the Himalyeh mountains is justly ascribed by Mr Webb to the great elevation of the table-land or terrace from which those mountain peaks spring up. As the heat of our atmosphere is derived chiefly from the radiation of the earth's surface, it follows that the temperature of any elevated point must be modified in a very important degree by the proximity and extent of the surrounding plains. These observations seem to refute satisfactorily the objections started respecting the great height of the Himalyeh mountains, which may be therefore safely pronounced to be the loftiest mountain chain on the surface of the globe.

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

"The little and short sayings of wise and excellent men are of great value, like the dust of gold, or the least sparks of diamonds."—Tillotson.

— No man ever offended his own conscience, but first or last it was revenged upon him.—South.

Anecdote of Murat.—It was said of Murat by Napoleon, that when he advanced to the charge, he resembled a Paladin of old more than a modern soldier. In his costume he imitated the ancient knights; his noble port shewed majestically under the chivalric garb; add to this his more than mortal daring, and we shall not wonder that the very Cossacks raised a shout of admiration when he approached them. A striking example of this occurred on the 4th of September. The King, with a few squadrons, had left Giatz, followed at some distance by the Grand Army; in his march he was much annoyed by clouds of Cossacks, who hovered about the heads of his columns, and from time to time compelled them to deploy. This troublesome series of interruptions at length incensed him to such a degree, that he galloped up to them unattended, and in an authoritative voice, cried out, "Cleur the way, vermin!" It is a fact equally extraordinary and incontrovertible, that these wild sons of the Desart were so awed by his manner, as involuntarily to obey the command; nor did they again block up the way during that day's march.—Family Library.

Animated Recitation of Racine.—I remember, says Valincour, that being one day on a visit to Boileau at Auteuil, with Nicole and some other distinguished men, we induced Racine to read to us the Œdipus of Sophocles. He recited the whole of it, translating it as he went on, and such was the animation of his delivery that we all felt to the fullest extent the sentiments of terror and compassion upon which the interest of that tragedy turns. I have seen our best actors on the stage, I have heard our finest pieces; but nothing either before or since so deeply affected me as this recital; and at the moment in which I am writing, I can imagine that I still see Racine, with his book in his hand, and all of us in mute admiration around him.

Indifference a Questionable Virtue.—It is often a very questionable merit which people attribute to themselves when they say, speaking of some personal controversy which may be occupying a portion of the public attention, "I know nothing about it; it is no concern of mine." The principle of non-interference may be carried too far, for oft-times personal controversies involve great principles, and not only may the individuals concerned be affected by the interest which the public take in the dispute, but dereliction of principle may escape due abhorrence and real worth be suffered to remain at a disadvantage, and all, that the inexpressive features of indifference may suffer no discomposure, and even have credit for a dignified unconcern. How much nobler is the sentiment in one of Beaumont and Fletcher's plays—

"When any fall from virtue I'm distract;
"I have an interest in it."

A Contented Moralist.—Porthaile, a celebrated preacher at Poictiers, having heard of the irregularities of a physician named Lurveau, who, though he had a handsome wife, could not be satisfied without change, pointed at him very pleasantly one day in the pulpit. After having spoken against this vice in general, he said, "Nay, we have heard with great concern, that there are some men who are so profligate as to commit adultery, though they have wives in their own houses, who are such, that for our part we should be well enough contented with them.—Scaligerana.

Anecdote of Wilkie the Painter.—I happened to dine in company with Mr Wilkie, the celebrated painter, and, in the course of the conversation, asked him "How he came to adopt that profession?" I enquired, "Had your father, or your mother, or any of your relations, a turn for painting? or what led you to follow that line?" Upon which Mr Wilkie said, "The truth is, Sir John, that YOU made me a painter."—"How, I!" with astonishment I exclaimed, "I never had the pleasure of meeting with you before." To which Mr Wilkie replied, "When you were drawing up the Statistical Account of Scotland, my father, who was a clergyman in Fife, had much correspondence with you respecting his parish, in the course of which you sent him a coloured drawing of a soldier, in the uniform of your Highland Fencible regiment. I was so delighted with the sight, that I was constantly drawing copies of it, and that made me a painter."—Sir John Sinclair's Correspondence.

The Ladies of Valparaiso.—A ball was given one night at the Governor Lastra's, to which I was invited, and amongst the guests was Colonel Alvarado. The ladies were not such as would have been found in first-rate society, in Santiago, but as it would have been impossible to make up a ball without them, a rather extended invitation had been issued; yet such is the natural grace of these people that they acquitted themselves extremely well; and looked very like their betters. I remember one of the officers of the Amphion frigate, who was there, telling me, that his partner had asked him after the dance, if he had yet engaged a washerwoman, at the same time offering her own services, should he not be provided with one.—Haigh's Sketches of Buenos Ayres, &c.

A Constant Lover.—There was something remarkable in M. Fleurieu's history; he was successively in love with three women of three different generations; first, in his early youth, of a woman much older than himself; next of her daughter, who was married to M. Mondorge (uncle of M. de Fleurieu.) This passion was a most unhappy one. Madame de Mondorge, on becoming a widow, married the Marquis of Arcamballe; she had a daughter whom M. de Fleurieu saw born. As soon as she attained a marriageable age, M. de Fleurieu fell in love with, and married her. This is a constancy of filiation, of which I know no other example. —Memoirs of Madame de Genlis.

Summary Injustice.—A Jew, named Shapdji, had acquired in trade, and in banking transactions, an immense fortune; he made the most noble use of his wealth: his generosity to the unfortunate secured to him the title of "Father of the poor," and this from the unanimous voice of Constantinople; for, superior to the restricted spirit of his caste, he gave to all, and whether the sufferer was Christian, Turk, or Jew, was disregarded by his universal philanthropy. Popular sympathy was strong in favour of such a man; and even the tenets of the Koran (fertile in its inculcations of charity) sanctified and defended him. But to the eyes of Mahmoud, instead of Shapdji's charity covering a multitude of sins, his wealth covered all his virtues! Money was wanted; money must be had; and he unrelentingly ordered the murder of the good man, and the confiscation of his property. The executioner and some chivoushes were despatched to the Jew's residence: the latter advanced and knocked at the door, which was forthwith opened by a servant. The chivoushes desired to speak with Shapdji: the servant requested them to enter. They declined doing so, and said that Shapdji must descend to them, as they were bearers of a message from the Porte. The charitable Jew was confined to his bed by sickness; but he sent down his brother to hear the business, or again to invite the messengers to ascend. They repeated that they must communicate personally with Shapdji—that he must come down—that their business with him would not occupy a minute. The sick man, nothing doubting what awaited him, rose from his couch, threw on his beneesh, and, supported by his brother and a servant, went down to the door. His foot had scarcely touched the threshold, when the executioner, who had hitherto remained concealed, rushed upon him, and passing the fatal cord over his neck, strangled him, without giving him time to offer up a prayer to his God. Shapdji's brother fell senseless into the street: the myrmidons of despotism turned the domestics out of the house, and put the imperial seal on its doors. The immense wealth was presently secured and conveyed to the hazné, and a donation of 100,000 piasters, or about 1800*l.* to the victim's brother, to keep him from starving, was generously made by the Sultan. When I was at Constantinople, the tragical tale was still in every one's mouth, and even Turks, grieved for the fall of the good Jew, regarded this proceeding of the Sultan with horror. It is the custom, on all executions ordered by the Porte, to affix a yafta or paper scroll to the bleeding head, or blackened corse, setting forth the offences of the deceased. The case of Shapdji was the first in which the yafta was omitted. So spotless was his life and conduct, that those who had the heart to kill could not accuse him.—Mac Farlane's Constantinople in 1828.

Wine.—An Asiatic chief being asked his opinion of a pipe of Madeira wine presented to him by an officer in the Company's service, said, he thought it a juice extracted from women's tongues and lions' hearts; for, when he had drank enough of it, he could talk for ever and fight the devil.

Vain Fears of Ignorance.—About the year 1426, the Dutch presented some pieces of tapestry to the Sovereign of Borneo. The imbecile Prince took the figures represented on them as men chained up, who, if admitted near his person, would strangle him in the night. No explanation could dissipate these vain terrors; he obstinately refused to accept the presents, or to admit into his capital those who brought them.—Esprit de G. T. Raynal.

Extraordinary Recognition.—In the year 1793, Mrs Cross, from Covent Garden Theatre, went to Scotland for the summer, and after the Edinburgh season had closed, the company went to Glasgow. On one occasion, the Provost visited the theatre, and as soon as Mrs Cross came on the stage, he loudly exclaimed, "Stop the play till I speak to that woman!" The manager instantly suspended the performance; the curtain was dropped. The Provost went round to Mrs Cross's dressing-room. After a few inquiries, he found her to be his wife, from whom he had been separated nearly twenty years. They each had supposed the other dead.—The husband immediately took her home, and the next evening she made her appearance at the theatre as a spectator.—Dramatic Table-Talk.

State-Paupers and the People.—Our State-paupers have their hands in every man's dish, and fare sumptuously every day. They live in palaces, and loll in coaches. In spite of Mr Malthus, their studs of horses consume the produce of our fields, their dog-kennels are glutted with the food which would maintain the children of the poor. They cost us so much a year in dress and furniture, so much in stars and garters, blue ribbons, and grand crosses,—so much in dinners, breakfasts, and suppers, and so much in suppers, breakfasts, and dinners. These Heroes of the Income-tax, Worthies of the Civil List, Saints of the Court Calendar (compagnons du lys), have their naturals and non-naturals, like the rest of the world, but at a dearer rate. They are real bona fide personages, and do not live upon air. You will find it easier to keep them a week than a month; and at the end of that time, waking from the sweet dream of legitimacy, you may say with Caliban, "Why, what a fool was I to take this drunken monster for a God!" In fact, the case on the part of the people is so far self-evident. There is but a limited earth and a limited fertility to supply the demands both of Government and people; and what the one gains in the division of the spoil, beyond its average proportion, the other must needs go without. Do you suppose that our gentlemen-placemen and pensioners would suffer so many wretches to be perishing in our streets and highways, if they could relieve their extreme misery without parting with any of their own superfluities?—If the Government take a fourth of the produce of the poor man's labour, they will be rich, and he will be in want. If they can contrive to take one half of it by legal means, or by a stretch of arbitrary power, they will be just twice as rich, twice as insolent and tyrannical, and he will be twice as poor, twice as miserable and oppressed, in a mathematical ratio to the end of the chapter, that is, till the one can extort and the other endure no more.—Yellow Dwarf.

Spontaneous Combustion.—A paper lately read to the Academy of Sciences at Paris, describes fifteen cases, from the details of which the following general results are obtained:—1. Generally those who have died by spontaneous combustion, have indulged in excess of spirituous liquors. 2. The combustion is almost always general, but in some cases it may be partial. 3. It is rare amongst men; and the women have in almost every case been aged. 4. The body and the viscera have always been burnt, whilst the feet, hands, and crown of the head have almost always been saved. 5. Although it is known by experience that a very large quantity of wood is requisite to burn a corpse, this particular kind of incineration occurs without inflaming the most combustible substances of an ordinary kind near it. 6. It has not been shewn, in any case, that the presence of fire is necessary to commence this kind of combustion. 7. Water, instead of extinguishing the flame, appears to give it more activity; and when the flame has disappeared, the combustion proceeds within. 8. They occur more frequently in winter than in summer. 9. The cure of general combustions has never been effected; but sometimes that of partial ones. 10. Those seized with combustion experience a sensation of strong internal heat. 11. It is suddenly developed, and consumes the body in a few hours. 12. Those parts not reached by the fire, are affected by gangrene. 13. A putrid degeneration ensues, which causes gangrene. 14. The residue of this combustion is composed of greasy cinders, and an unctuous matter.—Professor Jameson observes, in substance, upon this interesting question: "We are of opinion that, in some subjects, and chiefly in women, there exists a general condition of the body, which, conjoined with the extreme debility occasioned by age, a life of little activity, and the abuse of spirituous liquors, may give rise to a spontaneous combustion. But we are far from considering as the material cause of this combustion, either alcohol, or hydrogen, or a superabundance of fat. If alcohol plays a prominent part in this combustion, it is by contributing to its production: that is to say, it produces, along with the other causes mentioned, the degeneration of which we have spoken, which gives rise to new products of a highly combustible nature, the reaction of which determines the combustion of the body."—*Knowledge for the People. CURIOUS EXPERIMENT.—An eminent living geometer has proved by calculations, founded on strict optical principles, that in the centre of the shadow of a small circular plate of metal, exposed in a dark room to a beam of light emanating from a very small brilliant point, there ought to be no darkness,—in fact, no shadow at that place; but, on the contrary, a degree of illumination precisely as bright as if the metal plate were away. Strange and even impossible as this conclusion may seem, it has been put to the trial, and found perfectly correct. We must caution our readers, however, who would assure themselves of it by trial, that it is an experiment of some delicacy, and not to be made without several precautions to ensure success. The principles on which they depend will be detailed in that volume of the Cabinet Cyclopædia which is devoted to the subject of LIGHT.—Herschel's Discourse on the Study of Natural Philosophy.

NOTHING DESTROYED.—The researches of chemists have shown that what the vulgar call corruption, destruction, &c. is nothing but a change of arrangement of the same ingredient elements, the disposition of the same materials into other forms, without the loss or actual destruction of a single atom; and thus any doubts of the permanence of natural laws are discountenanced, and the whole weight of appearances thrown into the opposite scale. One of the most obvious cases of apparent destruction is, when anything is ground to dust and scattered to the winds. But it is one thing to grind a fabric to powder, and another to annihilate its materials: scattered as they may be, they must fall somewhere, and continue, if only as ingredients of the soil, to perform their humble but useful part in the economy of nature. The destruction produced by fire is more striking: in many cases, as in the burning of a piece of charcoal or a taper, there is no smoke, nothing visibly dissipated and carried away; the burning body wastes and disappears, while nothing seems to be produced but warmth and light, which we are not in the habit of considering as substances; and when all has disappeared, except perhaps some trifling ashes, we naturally enough suppose it is gone, lost, destroyed. But when the question is examined more exactly, we detect, in the invisible stream of heated air which ascends from the glowing coal or flaming wax, the whole ponderable matter, only united in a new combination with the air, and dissolved in it. Yet, so far from being thereby destroyed, it is only become again what it was before it existed in the form of charcoal or wax, an active agent in the business of the world, and a main support of vegetable and animal life, and is still susceptible of running again and again the same round, as circumstances may determine; so that, for aught we can see to the contrary, the same identical atom may lie concealed for thousands of centuries in a limestone rock; may at length be quarried, set free in the lime-kiln, mix with the air, be absorbed from it by plants, and, in succession, become a part of the frames of myriads of living beings, till some concurrence of events consigns it once more to a long repose, which, however, no way unfits it from again resuming its former activity.—Herschel's Discourse on the Study of Natural Philosophy.

DRURY LANE.

A NEW farce was produced here last night, christened (after Mr GRATTAN'S popular work) High-ways and By-ways. It has nothing however to do with that work, nor much with its title. Something was said in the introductory scenes of the advantages of going along the High-way of truth and open-dealing, instead of the By-way of cunning,—an excellent moral, and one very susceptible of comic handling. But the benefits of it were not particularly developed in this farce, any more than in a thousand others. Nobody shone in the Highway, and nobody was hurt beyond a laughable scratch or so in taking the other path.

Miss Gordon, an heiress (Miss S. PHILLIPS) is expecting a gentleman who is coming to marry her, according to the stipulations of a will, by which she is to forfeit her estate if she does not have him. Her elderly companion, Miss Primly (Mrs C. JONES) who regrets that she had never been married herself, and who takes a good-natured and anxious interest in forwarding the blessing for others, is accordingly in a fluster of anticipation, when Mr Narcissus Stubble (Mr LISTON) a traveller in the straw line, presents himself at their hospitable gate as a traveller overcome with storm and fatigue, and in want of a little rest. No names and no questions are asked. But the ladies take it for granted, that it is the bridegroom elect who is come to look about him; and the gentleman is asked in, and served with a cold luncheon and all the officiousness of a trio of footmen. Narcissus, who finds himself wonderfully well situated, and who asks no questions in his turn, except enough to find out the mistake and resolve to profit by it, astonishes the footman (among other gentilities) by inviting them to drink with him, and by construing the interrogation of "Chili, Sir?" (meaning the pickle) into a sympathetic enquiry whether he is not chilly with the rain he has met with. When he is alone, he soliloquizes (to the great amusement of the audience) on his merits, on those of his waistcoat and trowsers, and on his success with the fair. (The reader is to imagine LISTON all this while). He is habited, after the slang fashion of the day, in a waistcoat which he says was made out of his wife's shawl, and a pair of trowsers manufactured out of a bed curtain; and he has false mustachios, which he calls "sham captivators." The artillery of the eyes, he says, he has observed to be nothing in comparison with those lion-like weapons. The old lady, whom he flatters, takes a great liking to him, though he does not succeed so well in getting into the good graces of the young one. The former however gives him a sort of instalment in the house, and he thinks everything easy before him. At this juncture, while he is in another room, his "right earnest" promised bride, Miss Susan Plat (Mrs ORGER) a lady also in the straw line, enters the house in a red riding habit, and a hat professional, being upon her travels in search of the slippery man. She is accompanied by a fellow-traveller of the coach, Mr Stapleton (Mr COOPER) for whom the old lady has mistaken Mr Stubble, and whom the delusion which he finds prevailing induces to humour the joke. Narcissus, falsely turning his back upon his old mistress, is lording it more than ever, when Stapleton says to him, that of course he is aware the lady is to forfeit her estate if he does not marry her by such a time,—such being the Stapleton engagement in the will. Narcissus is struck dumb at this, instantly declares himself off, and is desirous of having back Miss Plat; but this lady now declares that she will have nobody but her delightful fellow-traveller, and that she does not know the other odd gentleman. Stubble pretending to fire at this, and bullying his fancied rival, the latter tells him that he must either fight him, consent to be beaten, or take off his mustachios. The mustachios are doffed; an eclaircissement takes place; the young lady, who has acquired a strong preference for Mr Stapleton, finds herself in the right; the old lady is astonished; and Miss Susan Plat, in spite of the recreant conduct and countenance of her pseudo-Whiskerandos, is content to take pity on him, and be his wife.

This is a pleasant farce, as the reader may guess by what we have related; not very new in the general cast of the incidents, but not old in the particulars; and as farces are always the better for doing, having a humourous eye to existing absurdities. We have seen LISTON in a richer part, but never saw him act any better; nor do we think we ever saw Mrs ORGER act so well, out of the pale of her servants and Sally Maggses. Miss Susan has a bit of the Maggs in her, but not enough to do away the individuality of the bustling platter of straw, who divides her conversation between the chace after her false swain and the superiority of her straw establishment, an advertisement of which she carries about with her in the shape of her hat. The clatter of all this, the tender sense of her injuries, and the petulance of her triumph over the poor man, Mrs ORGER gave with great truth and effect. It is a pity that the author put into her mouth two or three fancies a little too "lively," as Sir Anthony would call them. They endangered the success of his piece; and an actress, who enjoys the just estimation that Mrs ORGER does, and who is equally without prudery or boldness, must have felt mortified to become the medium of such a peril. We are not so particular with regard to these sallies, as many of our grave countrymen are; but an author should avoid putting them in a woman's mouth; especially as the actress, in proportion to the obligingness of her temper, and her very unwillingness to mention her objection to such passages, might be led to hope that the audience would avoid pressing them upon her.

Miss PHILLIPS introduced a song to CARAFFA'S pleasing air, 'Aura felice', which was encored. ☞

ADVERTISEMENTS.

The best PAPER for PARLIAMENTARY REPORTS, embracing also the various Departments of Literature.

THE ATLAS

(Double the size of the Morning Papers,) dedicates a greater space to the Reports of the Proceedings in Parliament than any other Journal. By a careful collation of all the Reports, corrected and revised with patient attention, it professes to have effected a striking improvement in the style of Parliamentary reporting, which divest the speeches of the effects of their weariness and tautology, without curtailing them in substance or spirit.

The ATLAS combines all the News, Foreign and Domestic, thrown into the Historical form, with independent criticisms on Literature, Music, the Drama, and the Fine Arts.

FACETIÆ.

Being a general Collection of the Jeux d'Esprit, illustrated by Mr ROBERT CRUIKSHANK. In two handsome vols. with gilt edges.

"These elegant little volumes, which are got up in a tasty manner, are well adapted for the drawing-room table, and will be eagerly sought for to beguile a weary hour. Under the title of 'FACETIÆ,' they comprise all the witty sallies and effusions of mirth that have appeared, from 'Monsieur Tonson' to 'Margate'—a humourous poem, which, though late in the field, is by no means inferior in merit to any of its predecessors. * * The illustrations alone are worth considerably more than the price charged for the whole work."—Morning Chronicle.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

THURSDAY, MARCH 17, 1831.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

The Correspondence of the Right Honourable Sir John Sinclair, Bart. with Reminiscences of the Most Distinguished Characters who have appeared in Great Britain, and in Foreign Countries, during the last Fifty Years. Illustrated by Fac-similes of Two Hundred Autographs. Two vols. 8vo. Colburn and Bentley.

The author of these volumes is well known as one of the most industrious political economists that ever lived; and he has hardly been less active as a traveller and a correspondent. He is a proof of that axiom, no less true than encouraging, that the more a man does, the more he may do. Sir John Sinclair is member of five-and-twenty foreign societies, chiefly agricultural; has written heaps of books, none of them, perhaps, very profound, but many useful; and here, besides notes of his travels, we have his correspondence for the last fifty years, with kings, ministers, republican-presidents, warriors, agriculturists and statists, doctors and divines, authors, literary ladies, and ladies not literary. He is now seventy-seven years of age, but says that he must be doing still; and therefore he proposes to complete what he calls the Codean system of literature, comprehending four great works, two of which have been published, and two are in preparation; to wit, a code of agriculture; a code of health and longevity; a code of political economy; and a code of religion: so that the worthy baronet will have done for us all, as much as any man can be expected to do, both here and hereafter. He will have shewn us how to get our food from the earth, how to enjoy it long, how to enable others to enjoy it with us, and how to lay up a stock for the next life. He says of Mr Bentham, "I respected his abilities much, but was always apprehensive that his ideas were too speculative to be practically useful." How Sir John proposes to merge the speculative in the practical, in his code of religion, remains to be seen. On the other hand, in his code of political economy, we suppose we shall discover, what have been the practical things hitherto in this world, which at certain periods were not thought too speculative by old-gentlemanly understandings. He says, moreover, in allusion to the same philosopher, that, "We did not require a new system of laws, but corrections of the old ones; and the alterations not to be rashly made, but gradually, and with due regard to the feelings and prejudices of the people." Oh, Sir John! the people have been getting on much faster than the post-chaises which carried you round to all the courts of Europe. Your book has hardly come out, when the people have shewn that it is not their prejudices, but those of the great landed proprietors, that stand in the way of alterations; and instead of requiring the alterations to be gradual, all that is wanted is, that they should be equally speedy and large. Great events make the answers for such men as Mr Bentham.

We propose to go regularly through these two volumes, after the travelling fashion, noting what we please, and passing over the rest. The books contain a good deal of curious matter, mixed up with much that can be interesting only to the author. Sir John is a most respectable old gentleman and writer, and it is pleasant for those who have leisure, to hear him enjoy his narrations; but the demand for variety in this little publication of ours, forces us to be content with select passages. We begin with a batch of kings, led by two imperial personages, who were thought philosophical in their day, because they fancied that they could be at once philosophical and imperial,—that they could surpass the literati, in their own mode of guiding the world; and at the same time, retain the dictatorship of illiterate times. Upon this rock of vanity, their philosophy was apt to split. Their successors, the Holy Allies, with the exception of a doubtful effort or so on the part of the Emperor Alexander, saw, or rather felt the hopelessness of the attempt, by dint of the very inferiority of their understandings, but with less credit to their reputations, and (as we are now all of us seeing) with no better luck. The two sovereigns alluded to are Joseph II, and the Empress Catherine. Of Joseph II, our author says,—

'The Emperor had nothing striking in his appearance, and would have passed unobserved, either in a street, or in a drawing-room. I found, that a higher idea was entertained of him in England than abroad, at least where I heard his character talked of. At the same time, there were many favourable circumstances in his private character, which I have much pleasure in enumerating.

'He was bred in the school of adversity; for his mother, the Empress Queen, kept him at a great distance, allowing him but a very limited income, and giving a decided preference to another brother, his junior, who died young. This treatment the Emperor talked of as a very fortunate circumstance, as it taught him many useful habits. It prevented him from growing either indolent or effeminate. He became, on the contrary, remarkable for punctuality in business, and endeavoured to have every moment usefully employed.' * * * * * * * * *

'He was reckoned by his own subjects severe, and even hard-hearted. He has been known to aggravate, and not to mitigate, the sentences of courts-martial; and in consequence of his express orders, they have been compelled to increase the punishments they had ordered. He abolished, however, in a great measure, the punishment of death; and malefactors were condemned to clean the streets, working in chains; which, to persons of humanity, was a spectacle of a most disagreeable kind.

'He obtained great popularity by receiving petitions, even from his meanest subjects, at a certain place in the palace, appointed for them to stand at, and to which he came personally by a private passage. Sometimes the finest young women in Vienna attended, under pretence of having grievances to be redressed. This often gave occasion for scandal. But he always said, that he was determined to keep no mistress, lest she should acquire an ascendancy over him; and, as to debauching women of condition, he thought such practices in the highest degree unworthy of a Sovereign.'—[It is right to observe, that these Italics are not Sir John's.]

'He occasionally mixed in private society, where he appeared to great advantage, being an entertaining and agreeable companion; in particular, an excellent story-teller. He was always ready (having a carriage and horses in waiting) to attend in person in case of fire, or any other accident; and some poor people, being on one occasion likely to be drowned in the Danube, a cobler said, "He would bring the Emperor to save them;" which he actually did, much to the Monarch's credit.

'He occasionally amused himself with discussing the modern philosophical discoveries in regard to the nature of air, &c. with the celebrated Dr Ingenhouze; and he behaved with much generosity to the famous Baron Born, having permitted him, not only to publish his discoveries in mineralogy, but to teach persons, from any foreign country, their nature and effects. In private life, therefore, his character was greatly superior to what it was usually considered to be.

'His public character was not so respectable. He was full of projects of aggrandisement, in which he never succeeded. He first attempted to conquer Bavaria, but immediately drew back at the threats of the Prussian eagle. He next attempted to open the Scheldt, but gave up that idea when France declared itself hostile to the project; and he likewise renounced his intention of exchanging the Netherlands, in consequence of the bold, decisive, but judicious opposition he met with from "the Germanic League." It is certain that he was anxious to signalize his reign by some important conquest; and for that purpose he entered into the most intimate connection with the Empress Catherine, with a view of conquering Turkey, and dividing its European dominions between them.

'As to England, he had conceived some strong prejudices against it; in so much, that when any of his subjects wished to visit it, he refused them leave.—"What is there to be seen in that country," he said, "that may not be seen elsewhere?" He afterwards, however, altered his tone.'—P. 5.

Joseph II should have lived to see what is doing in England now. He was a strainer at gnats and swallower of camels, and joined in the partition of Poland.

Catherine of Russia, far superior to Joseph in intellect, could be as foolish as he, where self-will and the pernicious habits of despotism were concerned. As long as she had everything her own way, she could be a very pleasant, vain, debauched, fat-growing, all-tolerant mistress, and interchanged little homages with the philosophers: but as soon as philosophy threatened to regard the human race as of more consequence than one woman, adieu to flattery and to France. The French then were only worthy of being "drubbed."

'The mode of living,' says Sir John Sinclair, 'adopted by the Empress was extremely regular. She rose between six and seven, and dedicated the morning entirely to business. She dined about one, and after dinner retired to her cabinet. The evening was devoted to amusements of a general nature, either at the theatre, or in her palace, with a select company of private friends.

'Her information, particularly in regard to political subjects, was very general and extensive. The instructions, written by her own hand, for drawing up a code of laws, is a most extraordinary performance for a woman; being, I believe, the only instance extant of female judicial legislation. I have seen her correspondence with the famous Buffon, which proves how well she was acquainted with philosophical subjects. She knew the French belles-lettres perfectly; and in 1786 was reading Shakspeare in the German translation. She also wrote comedies herself; and in any part of the world would have been accounted, in private life, a most accomplished woman.

'Her skill in government was great. In any progress through her dominions, she suffered the meanest peasant to address her; and they universally called her by the friendly and emphatic name of Matouskin, or Mother.'—[These despots like to be called Fathers and Mothers. It gives a tender colouring to their pretensions.]—'To the army, and to the guards in particular, she was very attentive, and on certain fixed days dined at a table with the officers of the different corps. Neither was the church neglected; for besides much attention to individuals of character and respect in that order, and a strict performance of all the outward forms of religion, she proved her zeal and devotion by working, with her own hands, as the priests believed or asserted, the most magnificent vestments, for the use of the principal ecclesiastics of her empire, when they celebrated public worship on any important festival.

'She had a number of personal favourites, to whom she was very liberal. She was particularly attached to Landskoi, and attended him personally during his sickness, like a wife. She was, for some time, as inconsolable for him as Elizabeth of England was for Essex. It is said that he was the handsomest man that could be seen; but naturally of so weak a constitution, that he was unable to support the life of a courtier. Potemkin made the quickest of all possible journeys across the Crimea, in order to console her. He came in a kibicki, or common cart, the whole way. Rushing into her apartment, he said, "What is the matter with my Empress?" And when she answered, that she was weeping for the death of Landskoi, he replied, "Why, he was a fool." "Ah!" said the Empress, "but he had an honest heart."—[This is affecting. Despotism helps to make all the world dishonest; and yet nothing but a little honesty can console it.]

'To her ministers she was very liberal, and in general followed their advice, except when she chose to make them feel that there were times when she preferred being both her own and their mistress. When left entirely to herself, and compelled to determine on matters of importance, it is said that she was apt to betray some versatility and weakness.'—P. 8.

Catherine was a clever German, with a great deal of will, among a nation of barbarians. This is the clue to her ascendancy. In a more southern country she would probably have been little thought of, in comparison with what she was reputed as the mother of her great clownish family of Russians.

We have next an anecdote connected with George III, which ought to be stuck up in all the haunts of royalty and self-will. The arbitrary have always had a tendency to grow fat, for the same reasons that incline them to be furious. The same people who can deny others everything, are famous for refusing themselves nothing.

'This Monarch (George III) was remarkable for his abstemiousness,—a habit which may be partly attributed to the following circumstance:—When his uncle, the Duke of Cumberland, the conqueror of Culloden, was on his death-bed, he sent for his nephew, and said to him, "You see the miserable state to which I am brought by an inordinate fatness. It is a family tendency, which nothing but great abstemiousness can prevent. Take, then, the dying advice of an affectionate kinsman and friend, and live with the greatest care and moderation. It is the only means by which you can avoid being brought to the unhappy condition to which you see me reduced." The death-bed admonition of a much-respected relation left a strong impression on the young Sovereign; and in order to prevent this constitutional tendency, he made it a rule to take violent exercise, and to live with the strictest abstinence.'—P. 21.

The following polite and insignificant person is Stanislaus (Poniatowski) King of Poland, one of the "lovers" of Catherine, and her lieutenant for his poor native country.

'I arrived at Warsaw on the 14th of October 1786, and next day had the honour of being introduced to the king. He was then in the 54th year of his age, about five feet nine inches in height, stout and good-looking, but not so handsome as I expected. His manners were refined, but he may be described rather as an amiable and accomplished gentleman, than an able statesman, fit to rule a nation, more especially in times of difficulty. He had a great desire to distinguish his government by something that might be useful to his country, to compensate for his misfortune of having reigned when the partition of Poland took place. His life had in it much more of distress than of pleasure, and he said himself that he had enjoyed few "beaux moments" during his reign. Among his happiest hours was that when the Diet, in consequence of a speech he made from the throne, unanimously granted, amidst cries of Vivat, Vivat, six millions of florins for establishing an academy of cadets at Warsaw.

'When I was introduced, he said that the name of Sinclair was well known to him, and in particular, the Sinclairs of Sweden. He also mentioned the assassination of a Major Sinclair in Poland by the Russians, which occasioned a war between the two countries. He was remarkably agreeable in conversation, and said the most obliging things in the most courteous manner possible: for instance, he regretted that my stay was likely to be short; adding that he would not have parted with me so soon, had he not believed that I was a good Englishman,—that I could be of service to my country at home,—and that it might suffer by my absence.'—P. 22.

Very gentlemanly indeed, and very sincere! And so King Stanislaus continued to reign under the Empress Catherine, who dismembered his country, and then she gave him an order to go about his business; and he did so: and the first scene in Poland, and the last, were the same in wickedness.

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

"The little and short sayings of wise and excellent men are of great value, like the dust of gold, or the least sparks of diamonds."—Tillotson.

An Unjust Debt handsomely Discharged.—A mulatto slave had run away from his master, and in the course of years had become a wealthy man, by the purchase of lands that were overrun with cattle. He had, on one occasion, collected in pens a great number of oxen, which he was arranging with his herdsmen to dispatch to different parts for sale, when a stranger, who came quite alone, made his appearance, and rode up to him, saying that he wished to have some private conversation with him. After a little time, they retired together, and when they were alone, the owner of the estate said, "I thank you for not mentioning the connection between us, whilst my people were present." It was his master, who had fallen into distressed circumstances, and had now made this visit in hopes of obtaining some trifle from him. He said he should be grateful for anything his slave chose to give to him. To reclaim him he well knew was out of the question—he was in the man's power, who might order him to be assassinated immediately. The slave gave his master several hundred oxen, and directed some of his men to accompany him with them to a market, giving out among his herdsmen, that he had thus paid a debt of old standing, for which he had only then been called upon.—Koster's Travels in Brazil.

Monastic Troubles.—The younger members of the Franciscan order enjoy very much the duty of going out to beg, as opportunities offer of amusing themselves. A guardian was chosen at Paraiba, some years ago, who examined the chest in which the money belonging to the community was kept, and on finding a considerable sum in it, gave orders that no one should go out to beg. He was a conscientious man, and said, that as they had already enough, the people must not be importuned for more, until what they possessed was finished. He kept the whole community within the walls of the convent for the term of two or three years, for which term each guardian was appointed. On another occasion, the friars of a Franciscan convent chose for their guardian a young man, whose life had been very irregularly spent, in anything rather than the duties of his calling, under the idea that, during the continuance of his guardianship, they should lead a merry life,—that very little attention would be paid to the rules and regulations of the Order; but they were mistaken: he changed his habits as soon as he found himself at their head; the gates were rigidly closed at the proper hour, and, according to the old and vulgar proverb of "Set a thief, &c." the duties of the convent were performed with much greater austerity than before.—Koster's Travels in Brazil.

Liberty All-important.—Let not any one falsely persuade himself, that those who keep watch and ward for Liberty are meddling with things that do not concern them, instead of minding their own business. For all men should know, that all blessings are stored and protected in this one, as in a common repository. Here is the tradesman's security, the soldier's honour, the agriculturist's profit. Lastly, in this one good of Liberty, the religious will find the permission of their rites and forms of worship, the students their learned leisure, the aged their repose, boys the rudiments of the several branches of their education, maidens their chaste nuptials, matrons their womanly honour and the dignity of their modesty, and fathers of families the dues of natural affection, and the sacred privileges of their ancient home. To this one solicitude, therefore, let all other cares yield the priority. If you omit, be occupied as much and sedulously as you may, you are doing nothing: if you apply your heart and strength to this, though you seem to be doing nothing, you will, nevertheless, have been fulfilling the duties of citizens and men, yea, in a manner pressed down and running over.—Petrarch.

Ætna has thrown out fire at intervals for 3,000 years. It is two miles in perpendicular height, and measures 180 miles round at the base. The crater forms a circle of about three and a half miles in circumference. Ætna has discharged, in some of its eruptions, a stream of lava four miles broad and fifty feet deep; advancing at the rate of seven miles in a day. Pindar is the first poet that mentions an eruption of Ætna.—[From Guy's Geographia Antiqua, a sensible school-manual of Ancient Geography, upon a new plan, forming at once a temptation to the study of maps, and a substitute for them upon occasion. The poetical quotations, with which the book is interspersed, are a very pleasing addition to it, and will be highly welcome to the young readers of Virgil and Ovid.].

A Charitable Hoarder.—The number of churches, chapels, &c. in Brazil, is quite preposterous; to these are attached a number of religious lay brotherhoods, of which the members are merchants, and other persons in trade; and some are even composed of mulatto and black free people. Some of these continually beg for a supply of wax, and other articles, to be consumed in honour of their patron. Almost every day in the year, passengers are importuned in the streets, and the inhabitants in their houses, by some of these people, and among others, by the lazy Franciscan friars. A Portuguese gentleman refused to give money for any of these purposes, but after each application, threw into a bag placed apart for the purpose, a 5 reis coin, the smallest in use, and in value the third part of a penny. At the end of a twelvemouth, he counted these coins, and found that they amounted to 30,000 reis, about 8*l.* 6*s.* He then applied to the vicar of his parish, requesting him to name some distressed person to whom he should give the money—Koster's Travels in Brazil.

Garrick in France.—The last time Garrick was at Paris, Preville invited him to his villa. Preville was reckoned the most accomplished comedian of the French Theatre. Garrick, being in a gay humour, proposed to travel in one of the hired coaches that go to Versailles, on which road the villa of Preville was situated. When they got in, he ordered the coachman to drive on: he answered that he would when he had his number of passengers. A droll whim seized Garrick, and he determined to give his brother player a specimen of his art. While the coachman was attentively plying for passengers, Garrick slipped out of the door, went round the coach, and, by his wonderful command of countenance, palmed himself upon the coachman as another passenger; this he did twice, and was admitted each time as a fresh passenger, to the astonishment and admiration of Preville. He whipped out a third time, and, addressing himself to the coachman, was answered in a surly tone, that the coach was full; and the man would have driven off without him, had not Preville called out, that as the stranger appeared to be a very little man, they would contrive to make room.—Dramatic Table-Talk.

An Obstreperous Sheep.—The guanaco is generally classed under the head of South American sheep, but I think it is more like a camel; it has memory and affection, as I shall give an anecdote to prove. I sent a pair of these animals as a present to a friend of mine, who has an estate in Surrey. The male died on the passage, but the female arrived safe in the London Docks. I bought them of an Indian market-woman, when they were only a few months old. Whilst they were in my posssession, she came to see them once a week, and they always showed great joy when she spoke to them, and would leap about and endeavour to get near her. Arrived in England, the female after some time took a fancy to one of my friend's carriage horses, and when he was turned out to grass, she would not allow any one to approach her favourite. When the carriage drove down the sweep, she would accompany her friend, and proceed bounding down the drive by his side, and became highly indignant when the lodge gate was closed against her. After committing a variety of freaks, such as knocking down the groom, and on more than one occasion, entering the kitchen, and frightening the cook from the spit, my friend voted "Miss Fanny" unmanageable, and returned her to me, and I placed her under the tuition of Mr Cross, head master of the academy for wild beasts at Exeter Change.—Haigh's Sketches of Buenos Ayres, &c.

THE PLAY-GOER.

BY THE ORIGINAL THEATRICAL CRITIC IN THE EXAMINER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

Covent Garden.—A Grand Selection of Music.

Covent Garden.

The reader understands, that we do not profess to witness the whole evening's performance of the Oratorios, or Musical Selections. We believe, as it is, that The Tatler is the only journal that takes notice of them; which appears somewhat extraordinary, considering the good houses they draw. Perhaps our brother-critics take them to be more sombre than they are. We are mistaken, if the public have not risen in their regard for them, in proportion as they have become less sombre. It struck us, when the Messiah was performed at Covent Garden, that the house was much thinner than during the Miscellaneous Selections.—Be this as it may, we, who take regular notice of these musical evenings, may be allowed to say that a whole evening at a time is too much for us, and that we do not profess ever to sit out more than a portion of it. Last night, for instance, we attended only from Miss Paton's air, 'If guiltless blood,' in the first part, down to the 'Soldier's Tear,' sung by Mrs Waylett in the second. There is not enough variety in the different evenings. It is natural enough, that certain favourite airs or pieces of music should be repeated, and that there should always be something of Handel and Haydn, besides a friendly or charitable sprinkling of modern names: but why not give us more of the favourite old masters? We have hitherto, we believe, had not a bit of Gluck or of Paesiello,—no Sacchini, no Corelli, no Winter. Why not give us the fine Overture to Iphigenia? Paesiello's La Rachellina would tell well in Miss Paton's mouth,—better still perhaps to an English audience, with the English words, 'Whither, my love:' to say nothing of Io sono Lindoro, Il mio bene, and twenty other compositions of that most original and charming melodist. There are pretty pickings in Sacchini's Opera of Rinaldo. Corelli's Pastorale would surely be worthy to share the highest heaven of Haydn and of Handel, heavenly as it may be: and where is the divine, voluptuous grief of Vaghi colli, Mi lasci o madre amaba, and all those delicious airs and harmonies of Winter's Proserpina, the very goddess of beautiful sorrow?

Mr Lee's tragic ballads, 'Rest, warrior, rest,' and 'The Soldier's Tear,' have some pleasing turns in them; but they are not so good as 'Come where the aspens quiver,' and 'Away to the mountain's brow;' nor do they get encores, as those do, notwithstanding the little clear notes and hushing cadences of Mrs Waylett. This lady is the prettiest ballad-singer, in one of the best senses of the word, that we have heard a long time, and capitally suits the composer. Mr Braham was as magnificent as usual in some of his favourite passages from Haydn's Creation. The chorus of 'The Heavens are telling,' is a truly glorious composition; hierarchical. The words 'Glory of God' come down upon the ear, as if the planets were rolling them.

We cannot admire Monsieur Oury's violin; but we are bound to say that the audience did most vociferously. It is very clever:—we do not mean to say that he is not a capital violinist, in the ordinary sense of the word, and very competent to teach bowing and execution: but to our apprehension, he wants depth of taste and feeling. He makes a hundred exquisite jerks, squeals, groans, and harmonics, now scuttling and scampering about the middle notes, then frisking it in alto, and then dropping down like lead, and behaving austerely in the bass; but he excites no emotion but wonder. The other evening he introduced 'Auld Robin Gray' in the midst of his vagaries, and last night the air of 'Sweet Home;' but he could not let them alone. A touching note he must make, he thinks, twenty times more touching by little ticklings and appogiaturas; and when you look for a simple and sufficing cadence, "most musical" because "most melancholy," he is off with it into his upper region, mewling and mystifying it like a cat upon the house-tops. He reminds us of Pennant the antiquary, who they say could not sit next a grave man in a wig, but he was seized with an irresistible propensity to snatch the wig off, and give the bereaved gentleman a chace for it.

'HIGH-WAYS AND BY-WAYS,' &c.

TO THE TATLER.

Mr Tatler,—The Farce of High-ways and By-ways, performed last night at Drury-Lane Theatre, and said to be written by Webster the Comedian, is an adaptation from Scribe and Varner's Vaudeville, M. Rigand, ou les Deux Amis, performed at the Théâtre des Variétés in 1819. The incident of Narcissus Stubble provoking Stapleton to take off his spectacles, and the retaliation of Stapleton, in forcing Stubble to doff his "sham captivators," is from a clever little Vaudeville by Scribe and Brazier, called Partie et Revanche, acted at the Gymnase in 1823.—Yours, &c.,

ADVERTISEMENTS.

GORTON'S TOPOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY.
This day is published, strongly bound in cloth and lettered, price 20s., or, with maps coloured, 30s., volume 1, of
A NEW TOPOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND.
Containing every city, town, village, and hamlet in the three kingdoms.
By JOHN GORTON,
Editor of the 'General Biographical Dictionary,' &c.

The Irish and Welsh articles by G. N. Wright, M.A., Professor of Antiquities to the Royal Hibernian Academy.

This work will continue to be published in monthly numbers, forming, when complete, three handsome volumes, accompanied by fifty-two quarto maps, as follows:

A general Map of England	1	Ireland	2
English Counties	39	Scotland	2
Yorkshire	2	Inland Navigation and Rail-roads	4
Wales	2

The whole beautifully engraved on steel, by Sidney Hall.

This work was commenced in January 1830, and, in accordance with the prevailing taste for cheap periodical literature, appeared in monthly numbers of 1s. each. The length of time it would occupy in publication being objected to, double numbers were substituted, in which manner it has since been regularly published, and will be continued; by this arrangement the proprietors are enabled to pledge themselves to the completion of the work in fifteen months.

This work may be usefully consulted by

The Merchant or Trader—who will acquire, at a glance, accurate information respecting commerce, manufactures, inland navigation, and intercourse; distance of each place from London and its post-town; mail arrival and departure; market days, fairs, &c.

The Lawyer—A most exact description of localities from the latest returns by Parliamentary authority; geographical boundaries, and their dependent rights and privileges; elective franchise, the distinctions existing therein and patronage; jurisdictions, corporate and municipal.

The Clergy—Much ecclesiastical information, at present derivable only from various sources, embracing the nature of the living, its value in the King's book, and actual value where under £150; patrons; institutions and endowments connected with public charities and education; ecclesiastical jurisdictions, &c.

And the General Reader or Tourist will find a spirited condensation of every point of interest connected with agriculture, geology, mineralogy, arts and sciences, so far as they bear upon the plan, population, social improvements, races, &c. with all other particulars that come within the province of the work.

One of the most decided improvements upon similar works will be found to consist in a single general alphabetical arrangement, which directs at once to any part of England, Scotland, Ireland, and the dependent islands, with all the precision of a separate alphabet for each. The plan has also been found useful as respects rapid reference on particular points, for which a consultation of the condensed heading of the articles will often be found sufficient. A strict attention has been paid to the peculiarities of local division and separate jurisdiction, and to all the information, both civil and ecclesiastical, from the population and other parliamentary documents, of a nature to be professionally useful, and to preclude the necessity of further inquiry.

The approbation bestowed upon its accompanying maps, executed by Mr Sidney Hall, has been unanimous; and it may be safely affirmed that kindred works, of far higher price and pretension, will not admit of comparison with them, either as to correctness or execution. As no expense has been spared in any branch involving the obvious utility of the undertaking, the proprietors have the satisfaction to announce that great success has rewarded their efforts, and they trust that continued encouragement will enable them to render the work, as originally promised, one of the cheapest and most serviceable abridgments ever issued from the press.

London: Published by CHAPMAN and HALL, 186, Strand; and sold by all Booksellers.

This day is published, price 4s., neatly bound, and illustrated with Maps,
GUY'S GEOGRAPHIA ANTIQUA;
Or, School Treatise on Ancient Geography, upon a New Plan.
By JOSEPH GUY, Jun.
Of the University of Oxford, Author of the English School Grammar, &c.

The object of the present work is to facilitate the study of Ancient Geography, by adopting a lucid and practical arrangement, combined with much useful and interesting information, both geographical and historical: and enriched with extracts from the most admired translations of the ancient poets; adapted, therefore, to the classical and the English learner, both in Gentlemen's and Ladies' Schools. Under-graduates at colleges also, it is presumed, may find in it a useful remembrancer.

"This is one of the very best treatises on ancient geography for the use of schools, which has been published. We confidently recommend it to students, and masters of academies."—Morning Advertiser, Jan. 28, 1831.

"Here is a place well supplied, which has been too long vacant—an excellent addition to the school library. If such a treatise had been in use forty years ago, stores of valuable antiques, and much knowledge of history now consigned to oblivion, would have been spared to posterity."—Atlas, Jan. 16, 1831.

"As complete a little school book as we have lately met with. We are glad at length to see the subject reduced to a small compass, and placed before the learner in an intelligible form."—Spectator, Jan. 22, 1831.

"Another school book of great practical utility. The quantities and proper accentuation of the different places will be found useful to those who read the classics only in translations, while the addition of the modern names renders the work of greater practical benefit to all parties."—Intelligence, Feb. 13, 1831.

"A book containing much curious information, equally interesting to the classical scholar and the general reader."—Sunday Times, Jan. 23, 1831.

FRIDAY, MARCH 18, 1831.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

The Correspondence of the Right Honourable Sir John Sinclair, Bart. with Reminiscences of the Most Distinguished Characters who have appeared in Great Britain, and in Foreign Countries, during the last Fifty Years. Illustrated by Fac-similes of Two Hundred Autographs. Two vols. 8vo. Colburn and Bentley.

We need not trouble the reader with any further intimations of Sir John's politics. They are of an old school, the last remains of which are now breaking up, and will be more acceptable to the political antiquary than any one else. Suffice it to say, that our author, in spite of them, being an enthusiastic agriculturist, became of necessity a sort of universalist; and that, for a warm Pittite and old King's man, he accordingly fraternized with new men and American republicans, in a way that sufficiently accounts for the cold looks and closed doors he occasionally met with at head-quarters, to say nothing of the time which his speculations took up in explaining themselves. It is easy, and not unpleasing, to see that an attentive ear lent to his agricultural or Caledonian projects gave him a good opinion of anybody, new or old; and that the reverse did not add to the merits of those whom he wished to think the best of. Old or new, he could not help entertaining a reverence for the "powers that be." He reverenced George III, reverenced Washington; and gives us to understand, though with something like an apology, that he could not help reverencing the new family on the throne of Sweden.

This brings us to our next quotation. He says, speaking of Bernadotte's son, "Prince Oscar,"—'It was impossible for one, who had the charge of printing Ossian in the original Gaelic, not to take a peculiar interest in the character and conduct of a young Prince, named after one of the most celebrated heroes in the poems of Ossian; and I had therefore much satisfaction in receiving from that distinguished personage the following communication:—

'Sir,—I accept with as much pleasure as gratitude the offer you make me, of being elected an honorary Member of the two societies known under the name of the Highland Societies of London and Scotland.

'The object of their labours is not unknown to me. The Celtic heroes were brothers and friends of the Scandinavian heroes; and their glory interests me doubly, since I happen to bear the name of one of their most famous warriors.

'I am obliged by the proposal you make me of sending me the poems of Ossian. We have, indeed, a Swedish translation of them, but it appears to me imperfect. I shall embrace with pleasure the opportunity of shewing you the interest I take in your exertions, by the zeal with which I shall patronize a new translation into the Swedish and also into the Norwegian language, of those immortal works, which call such pleasing recollections to the people of the North, and which, among other conceptions new and sublime, contain the idea so truly poetical, of assigning the clouds as the abode of departed heroes, and of thus rendering them witnesses of the actions, the pains, and the pleasures of their relations and friends,' &c. &c.—P. 59.

It is seldom we meet with a poetical criticism in the letter of a prince. Unfortunately, when boys write such letters, whether princes or not, it is impossible to say what part their tutors have had in them.

Sir John informs us, that he had "no communication with the Emperor Napoleon, either personal or epistolary." He seems to have been afraid of meeting with some brusquerie from the man of iron; or perhaps he thought it would be venturing his universalities a little too far. On the other hand, he knew the king of Saxony, Gustavus III of Sweden, the Prussian and Brunswick families, &c. and he had frequent intercourse with the house of Bourbon, both in its prosperous and adverse circumstances. He could not get the Count d'Artois (Charles X) to enter into his agricultural feelings. He says the Duke of York "had a good deal to say;" but about what, or of how much value, does not appear. The following Bourbon anecdote is worth extracting.

'There was a singular contrast in my reception at the court of France, at two different periods. On the 1st of Jan. 1787, I was presented to Louis the Sixteenth, by the Duke of Dorset, the British ambassador, and the crowd was so great, that he hardly took notice of any of those who were introduced to him. But after the battle of Waterloo, I went in the Highland dress; and no one could receive a more gracious reception from his successor. "That is the garb," his Majesty said, "which I particularly admire, and those who wear that dress, will always be acceptable at my court." '—P. 43.

So much for our author's royal acquaintances: we now come to his ministerial. Of Mr Pitt, he says,—

'He was certainly a most extraordinary character, but came too soon into power; before he had acquired that political knowledge and experience, without which no man can be a successful minister, more especially in times of difficulty. Though he supported the establishment of a board of agriculture, it was not done with the zeal, nor was the plan carried to the extent, that seem to me necessary to render it completely efficient. In fact, he was more inclined to promote the commerce and manufactories, than the agriculture of the country; and he never could be prevailed upon to attend any of those fêtes, which tended so much to promote a spirit of agricultural improvement. It is singular, not so much perhaps, after the other fact, that he gave no encouragement to the fine arts, nor to literature. His whole mind seems to have been engrossed by politics. Latterly, he thought of nothing but how to defend his country from the infection of the destructive principles, and detestable example of French republicanism. In that he fortunately succeeded, and hence he was justly entitled to be celebrated as "The pilot who weathered the storm." '—P. 90. [Query all this?—epithets, facts, and all.]

'Mr Pitt was lively and amusing in conversation, particularly in the company of his early friends, to whom he was much attached, and who entertained for him a reciprocal regard. He condescended even to be a punster, of which I recollect a very happy instance. After my return from the tour already mentioned, through the northern parts of Europe, I happened to dine in his company, when he took occasion to ask me, "Of all the places where you have been, where did you fare best?" My answer was, "In Poland; for the nobility live there in uncommon taste and splendour; their cooks are French—their confectioners Italian,—and their wine Tokay." He immediately observed, "I have heard before of the Polish Diet."—P. 90.

'One touch of punning makes the whole world kin.'

This is the best anecdote we ever read of Pitt.

The boroughmongers ought to make use of the following. It would enable them to swear that all England consisted of free voters.

'It is hardly to be credited the exertions that were made to secure Mr Fox's election for Westminster, and the popular spirit that was raised for his support. A friend of mine, Lord Grimstone, who being then only an Irish peer, was entitled to vote, went in his carriage to the hustings to vote for Sir Cecil Wray. When he returned to his carriage, his coachman said to him, "I hope that your Lordship will now allow me to poll." Certainly (said Lord Grimstone), and for whom are you to vote? "Why, for Mr Fox to be sure, my Lord." To which Lord Grimstone very good-naturedly replied, "I wish, John, that you had told me sooner, and we might then have paired off." '—P. 95.

Mr Fox one day received "some papers" from our author, on the subject of "waste lands." (Awful sound!) The good-natured statesman thought to secure himself against the consequences, by writing the following letter, acknowledging the receipt; but Sir John appears to have been too cunning for the fox, and has nailed up his memory accordingly in terrorem for all epistolary evaders.

'Sir,—I received by last night's coach your packet, containing three printed pieces, and the letter you did me the honour to write me on the 8th instant. I have not yet had time even to look at the papers, but would not delay returning you my thanks for your communication, and assuring you that I am, Sir,

'Your most obedient servant,

'C. J. Fox.

'This,' quoth Sir John, 'is a very convenient system for a statesman to adopt, merely acknowledging the receipt of papers, promising to read them, and avoiding giving any opinion of their contents.'

'I have heard it affirmed,' continues the author, 'that when Mr Fox was Secretary of State for the Home Department, and carried on a correspondence with Talleyrand for the restoration of peace, that he wrote not only all the most important letters regarding the negociation, but duplicates of them, with his own hand, determined that no one in this country but himself should know what was going forward. This was carrying diplomatic secrecy to a very extraordinary extreme. By so much personal labour, to which he had not been accustomed, and the vexation arising from the violent attacks of his political opponents, his dissolution was greatly hastened; and he found that the possession of political power was not the means of securing either peace of mind or health of body.'—P. 96.

There are two or three testimonies to the same effect, with regard to the possession of power. They are among the most striking passages in the work. Here is one:—

'I had once a discussion with a gentleman, who had been for a great number of years in public situations, upon the effect of such appointments [to office] on the character of those who were thus elevated into power. He said, that he had never seen a minister, after he was appointed to any high situation, who had preserved his temper: that the Marquis of Carmarthen (afterwards Duke of Leeds), who had been appointed by Mr Pitt, Secretary of State for the Foreign Department, was the person who had preserved it the longest; but that in the space of a few months, even his good temper was subdued, and he became as irritable as his predecessors.'—P. 67.

Another:—

'In December 1796, I happened to meet with Lord Melville at St James's, when he said to me, "It is a long time (Sir John) since you have been at Wimbledon. Name any time when you can spend a day with us, and we shall be most happy to see you." By accident I fixed upon the last day of that year. Upon reaching Wimbledon to dinner, I found Mr Pitt there. Lady Melville, and the beautiful Miss Duncan (afterwards Lady Dalrymple Hamilton), were the only ladies present. We spent the evening principally in conversation, but also spent a short time at cards; and about eleven we went to bed. As soon as I got up the next morning, I proceeded to Mr Dundas's library, where I found him reading a long paper on the importance of conquering the Cape of Good Hope, to add to the security of our Indian possessions. I said to him, on entering, "I come, Mr Dundas, to wish you a good new year, and many happy returns of it." His answer I shall never forget; "I hope that this year will be happier than the last, for I scarce recollect spending one happy day in the whole of it." On this remark the following reflections naturally occurred: "Here I am, living in the same house with the two men the most looked up to, and the most envied of any in this country. I have just heard the declaration of the one, and I am convinced that the feelings of the other are not materially different. Can anything more strongly prove the miseries attending political pursuits?" '—P. 105.

Sir John exaggerates, perhaps, the romantic character of the following story; but it is curious, and worth repeating. The heroine, with all her romance, appears to have been a proper Scotch lassie, with a right knowledge of the main chance. But she has simplicity too, and cordiality. It is pleasant to hear her say, that if the gallant surgeon succeeded in India, "he would send for her."

'My acquaintance with Mr Windham led to a train of circumstances, which, taken together, form one of the most singular series of adventures that ever occurred in real life, and resemble more a fictitious romance than an authentic history.

'At a late hour one evening, I received a few lines from my friend, Dr Adam Smith (the particular time I do not recollect) requesting my company at dinner next day, to meet the celebrated Edmund Burke and Mr Windham, who had arrived at Edinburgh with an intention of making a short tour through the Highlands. The Doctor apologized for the shortness of the notice, stating, that the travellers had arrived only that morning, and proposed remaining but one day more in Edinburgh. I went accordingly, and passed some hours, as might be expected, in the company of such men, in the most gratifying manner. I gave them my advice as to the plan they ought to adopt in making their intended tour; and, in particular, dwelt on the beauty of the road between Dunkeld and Blair: adding, that instead of being cooped up in a post-chaise, they had better get out, and walk through the delightful woods and beautiful scenes they would pass through, more especially some miles beyond Dunkeld.

'I had almost forgotten these circumstances, when, about three years after, Mr Windham, very unexpectedly, came to me in the House of Commons, and requested to speak to me for a few moments, behind the Speaker's chair. "Do you recollect," said he, "our meeting together at Adam Smith's at dinner?"—"Most certainly I do."

'"Do you remember having given us directions for our Highland tour, and more especially to stroll through the woods between Dunkeld and Blair?"—"I do."

'He then added, "An event took place in consequence of our adopting that advice, of which I must now inform you. Burke and I were strolling through the woods, about ten miles from Dunkeld, when we saw a young female sitting under a tree reading. Burke immediately exclaimed, 'Let us have a little conversation with this solitary damsel, and see what she is about.' We accosted her accordingly, and found that she was reading a recent novel from the London press. We asked her how she came to read novels? How she got such books at so great a distance from the metropolis; and more especially one so recently published? She answered, that she had been educated at a boarding-school at Perth, where novels might be had from the circulating library, and that she still procured them through the same channel. We carried on the conversation for some time, in the course of which she displayed a great deal of smartness and talent, and at last we were obliged very reluctantly to leave her, and proceed on our journey. We afterwards found, that she was the daughter of a proprietor of that neighbourhood, who was known under the name of the Baron Maclaren. I have never been able," continued Mr Windham, "to get this beautiful mountain nymph out of my head, and I wish you to ascertain whether she is married or single." He begged me to clear up this point, as soon as possible, as much of his future happiness depended upon the result of the enquiry.

'I lost no time in attending to this request, and applied for information to a most respectable clergyman, in the neighbourhood where Miss Maclaren lived (the Rev. Dr Stewart, Minister of Moulin) who informed me in the course of post, that she was married to a medical gentleman of the name of Dick, who had gone to the East Indies. Upon communicating this to Mr Windham, he seemed very much agitated. He was soon afterwards married to the daughter of a half-pay officer. I have no doubt, however, that had Miss Maclaren continued single, he would have paid her his addresses.

'Some years afterwards, I happened to be spending some days at Duneira, in Perthshire, with the late Lord Melville; and in the course of our conversation, mentioned the above anecdote of Mr Windham; upon which the noble lord said, "I am more interested in that matter, than you imagine. You must know that in company with some friends, I was riding down from Blair to Dunkeld, when we called on Baron Maclaren, where a most beautiful young woman desired to speak with me. We went accordingly to to the bank of a river, near her father's house, when she said, "Mr Dundas, I hear that you are a very great man, and, what is much better, a very good man. I will venture, therefore to tell you a secret. There is a young man in this neighbourhood, who has a strong attachment to me, and, to confess the truth, I have a great regard for him. His name is William Dick: he has been bred to the medical profession; and he says that if he could get to be a surgeon in the East Indies, he would soon make his fortune there, and would send for me to marry him. Now, I apply to you, Mr Dundas, as a great and a good man, in hopes that you can do something for us; and be assured, that we shall be ever grateful, if you will procure him an appointment. Lord Melville was so struck with the impressive manner of her address, that he took her by the hand, and said, "My good girl, be assured, that if an opportunity offers, I shall not forget your application."

'Lord Melville then added, that some time afterwards he received a summons to attend his duty in Parliament, and in his way happened to visit a friend who was an East India Director. After dinner, his friend said to him, "By the bye, Mr Dundas, politicians, like you, have many applications in favor of young men in various lines of life. I think it right therefore to tell you, that I have at present, at my disposal, an appointment of surgeon in the service of the East India Company, and that it is much at your service."

'Lord Melville was so much surprised at the singularity of the circumstance, that he struck his hand forcibly against the table where they sat, and exclaimed with much vehemence, "The very thing I most anxiously wished for." He then related his adventure at Baron Maclaren's, greatly to the amusement of the India Director. Mr Dick was immediately appointed surgeon; and having gone to the East Indies, was soon placed in a situation which enabled him to send for Miss Maclaren, to whom he was married, and Mr Windham was thus disappointed of his northern alliance. In the course of the voyage, and after her arrival in the East, she had several offers; but she refused to hear of any one but Dr Dick.' —P. 142.

We have left the surname of Dick standing as in the text, because it is unpleasant to read a story with dashes for names; but a note in another part of the work informs us, that the hero turns out not to have been so named; though the other particulars (as far as we have repeated them) are true.

Why are some clergymen of the Church of England called Rectors, some Vicars, and some Curates?—Because when the clergyman receives both the large and the small tithes, the parish is called a Rectory; when the large tithes are separate property, and only the small ones are received by the clergyman, it is called a Vicarage. A Curate is the clergyman who does the duty for the Rector or Vicar.—Why are tithes received?—Because the church demands their support—they were granted by Ethelwolf 1000 years ago, for the maintenance of the clergy, the repairs of the church, and the support of the poor and helpless.—Universal Why and Because.

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

" The little and short sayings of wise and excellent men are of great value, like the dust of gold, or the least sparks of diamonds."—Tillotson.

Visible Invisibility.—In the inventory of the Lord Admiral's properties, given by Mr Malone, is, " a robe for to goe invisibell." It was probably of a light gauzy texture, and afforded a sufficient hint to our ancestors, not to see the person invested with it; or rather, to understand that some of the characters on the stage were not to see him.—Family Massinger.

— The first woman who appeared in a regular drama, on the English stage, played Desdemona, about the year 1660. Her name is unknown.—Family Massinger.

Angel in the sense of bird is frequently met with among our old writers. Jonson beautifully calls the nightingale " the dear good angel of the Spring." And if this should be thought, as it probably is, a Grecism; yet we have the same term in another passage, which will admit of no dispute:—

" Not an angel of the air,
Bird melodious, or bird fair," &c.
(Two Noble Kinsmen.)—Family Massinger.

Students in Painting are often led astray by the worst parts of Reynolds, Rubens, and the Venetian school, instead of forming their style from the Roman and Florentine, and the grace and beautiful simplicity of the antique. On this subject, a celebrated professor and critic thus expressed himself, on being applied to by some young men for recommendations to the school for painting: " One tells me he paints like Titian, another like Vandyke, and they all draw like the devil knows who."—Sass's Journey to Rome and Naples.

John O'Groat's House is about a mile and a half from the extreme point of Dungisbay Head (the northermost point of Scotland.) Tradition assigns its erection to an individual, one of eight resident proprietors of the name of Groat, who lived in the reign of James IV, by whom it was constructed with as many doors, to prevent them quarrelling about precedency, which depended much upon priority of entrance and departure. Some grave writers have called it a sensible contrivance.—Gorton's Topographical Dictionary.

Power of the People.—With the masses, that is to say, the great bulk of the people, always must rest the supreme force: when they are unanimous and in motion, there is no other force in a state that can resist it. They have besides a force of inertia: the secret is to know what they will tolerate, and how much they will bear: this is the limit of the authority of a governing power. In the middle ages, this force was merely brutal; it was moreover incapable of exercising its real power from want of mutual communication. The feudal system tried to cope with it, by multiplying its own force, by means of armour, horses, and implements of war, the building of castles, donjons, and keeps; and on the other hand, by reducing the masses into the vilest state possible, and shackling their exertions by every force, physical and moral, that they knew of. The clergy attacked them intellectually; they infused into them certain notions of their own sanctity, and turned the religion of Christianity into a further means of power, by convincing the ignorant man that it was for his interest to be guided by them, that his fate in the next world was in their hands. The seigneur bound the body of his thrall, the priest his mind:—the giant was blind. Gradually, with the progress of his intellectual improvement, has the influence of his power been felt; but even in the state of his uttermost darkness, his power was known and his temper consulted. They were afraid he would burst his bonds. It may be observed that reformation never took place till the masses were ripe for them. There were many Luthers before the successful one. Why did Luther from his cell, at Wittenberg, pour forth his bulls with more authority than the Pope? Why was he not seized and burnt like so many before him? Simply because his voice found an echo in every bosom; the masses were with him; and before them, kings, popes, and even armies are powerless.—Foreign Quarterly Review: Art. On the Spirit of the Twelfth and Thirteenth Centuries.

A Pleasant Blunder in Ireland.—It has been said that Goldsmith's comedy of She Stoops to Conquer originated in the following adventure of the author. Some friend had given the young poet a guinea, when he left his mother's residence at Ballymahon, for a school in Edgworth's-town, where, it appears, he finished his education. He had diverted himself by viewing the gentlemen's seats on the road, until night-fall, when he found himself a mile or two out of the direct road, in the middle of the streets of Ardagh. Here he enquired for the best house in the place, meaning an inn; but a fencing-master, named Kelly, wilfully misunderstanding him, directed him to the large old-fashioned residence of Sir Ralph Featherstone, as the landlord of the town. There he was shown into the parlour, and found the hospitable master of the house sitting by a good fire. His mistake was immediately perceived by Sir Ralph, who, being a man of humour, and well acquainted with the poet's family, encouraged him in the deception. Goldsmith ordered a good supper, invited his host and the family to partake of it, treated them to a bottle or two of wine, and, on going to bed, ordered a hot cake for his breakfast; nor was it until his departure, when he called for his bill, that he discovered that, while he imagined he was at an inn, he had been hospitably entertained at a private family of the first respectability in the country.—Dramatic Table-talk.

Napoleon at Sea.—Bourrienne, in his Memoirs, gives some interesting particulars of the habits and occupations of Napoleon when at sea. In the following passage, the good natural feeling manifested appears in strange contrast with the recklessness induced by a military conqueror's usual pursuits:—' In a long voyage. it is impossible to prevent accidents from men falling overboard. This occurrence happened several times with us, from the crowded state of our vessel. On these occasions it was strange to witness the instinctive force of humanity in the bosom of that man, so lavish of the blood of his fellow-creatures on the field of battle, and who was about to shed torrents of it in that very Egypt whither we were going. Whenever a man fell into the water, the commander-in-chief had no rest till he was saved. He instantly ordered the ship to lay to, shewed the most lively uneasiness till the unfortunate was recovered, and ordered me to recompense liberally those most active in the rescue. Sailors who had thus distinguished themselves, when guilty of some breach of discipline, were always exempted from punishment. I remember, during one dark night, a noise was heard as of a man overboard. Bonaparte instantly gave the word to put the ship about till the presumed victim should be rescued from inevitable death. The crew hastened from all quarters, exertions were redoubled, and at length we fished up—what? The victim was—a quarter of beef, which had slipped from a noose over the side. He ordered me to reward the sailors who had exposed themselves on this occasion more liberally than usual. " It might," said he, " have been a man, and these brave fellows have shewn neither less activity nor less courage." '—Constable's Miscellany, No. 57.

Drury Lane.

We looked in here last night, and saw a portion of Der Freischutz. We have often intended to do so, but delayed the moment, fearful of finding our anticipations realised. It is painful to be obliged to add, that such is the case. We hate to differ with the many: we are compelled to speak as we think. We can only say therefore, in self-defence, that we are accustomed to the society of Shakspeare, Raphael, and Mozart; and being so accustomed, are forced to add, that we cannot help considering those who think Weber a composer of the highest order, deficient in imagination. His fine movements are the exceptions. His general character is that of a cold, formal, and literal, not to say sickly composer, who mistakes description for feeling, and thinks he has given us the effect of an emotion, by repeating its commonest language. He groans, he sighs, and he shouts, and then waits for our approbation. But this is not sympathy: it is an echo. It is not the business of music to paint, or even to think, but simply to feel, and to present us its feeling in new and beautiful modulations. The fits and starts, and analogies in which Weber deals, are only its caprices or its licences. What we demand of a great Composer is, a fine continuous melody, with a delicious emotion pervading it, at once expressive yet vague, the representative of the most indefinite part of our sensations. If he can bring a throng of the graces of harmony to wait upon this, so much (perhaps) the better:—at all events, he must not sacrifice the Goddess to her attendants; but merely to groan for our groans, to sigh for our sighs, to start, to shiver, and be astonished, however ingeniously, this is what we feel we might all do, with the proper musical teaching; and that is the reason, perhaps, why the common run of the musical world admire it, and others become tired. Last night the audience were half asleep, except at intervals; and numbers went away, as we did, before the piece concluded. The best thing we heard was the Drinking Song; which (to shew how we love a good thing when we meet with it) we persisted in trying to get encored, and succeeded.

FOREIGN QUARTERLY REVIEW.

Contents:—I. Spirit of the Twelfth and Thirteenth Centuries.—II. Mythology and Religion of Ancient Greece.—III. Andral on Consumption.—IV. Carl Maria von Weber!—V. The Fine Arts of the Middle Ages.—VI. History of the Hanseatic League.—VII. History of the Ancient Germans.—VIII. Correspondence between Schiller and Goethe.—IX. The Brunswick Revolution.—X. United States of America.—XI. German Pocket Books for 1831.—XII. Critical Sketches of Greek, Hebrew, French, and German Works.—XIII. Miscellaneous Literary Notices from France, Germany, Holland, Italy, Russia, and Spain.—List of the Principal New Works published on the Continent, from October to December, 1830, inclusive.—Notices to Correspondents.

"This Review bids fair to be the most interesting of all the Quarterlies. In a literary point of view, it is equal to the very best of them already. Its articles are generally chosen with sound judgment, and almost uniformly executed with great ability. Its political principles are liberal and enlightened, and it seems to be entirely free from the spirit of partisanship. On the whole, we cannot hold out to our literary friends a higher treat, either in point of variety or utility, than a perusal of this number of the Foreign Quarterly Review."—Perthshire Advertiser.

"What wonderful students these Germans are! See what a flood of light they throw on every abstruse part of antiquity, by dint of that singular union of industry and enthusiasm, labour and imagination, united with a beautiful simplicity and homely feeling (elsewhere shown in this number, in the Life of Weber, to pervade all classes in that country), which our would-be-wits sneer at, and call, in derision, Germanism!"—Glasgow Free Press.

"The present is, in our opinion, the most powerful number that the Foreign Quarterly has yet published."—Edinburgh Literary Journal.

"An invaluable work, and one undoubtedly at the head of our periodical literature; admirable for the spirit of liberality which everywhere pervades its pages, and for its historic lore and profound philosophical criticism."—The Irishman.

"In point of erudition and elegance of diction, this number will be found equal to any of its predecessors. History, in her classic and most animating form, is revived in these pages, and imparts to them, in this age of literary levity and frivolity, a peculiar and important character."—East India Magazine.

"The number before us is a superior one to most of its predecessors, first, from the miscellaneous character of its information; secondly, from the able way in which that information has been condensed and made acceptable to the most listless and impatient readers."—Sun.

"The Foreign Quarterly keeps up its interest and ability; and this is saying much on its behalf, after the honest and disinterested praise we have awarded to its former numbers. One cause of the gratification with which we open a new number of this periodical we must say a word or two upon, in the hope that it may recommend it to others, who, like ourselves, feel an increasing aversion to being pestered with the vituperative wranglings of party politicians. The Foreign Quarterly is delightfully free from such nuisances; it is unmarked by the odious plague-spot of faction. For these reasons we cordially recommend the Foreign Quarterly to the notice and support of such of our readers as may not be so hopelessly engrossed by the topics which absorb all the attention of the quidnuncs of the day, as to have no thought to spare for the general interests of literature and science."—Suffolk Chronicle.

SATURDAY, MARCH 19, 1831.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

The Correspondence of the Right Honourable Sir John Sinclair, Bart. with Reminiscences of the Most Distinguished Characters who have appeared in Great Britain, and in Foreign Countries, during the last Fifty Years. Illustrated by Fac-similes of Two Hundred Autographs. Two vols. 8vo. Colburn and Bentley.

Our author justly praises the fair sex for their excellence in letter-writing; but though the list of his female correspondents contains some eminent names, the letters are neither numerous nor striking. The best is from the celebrated Duchess of Gordon. It is in a straight-forward energetic style, answering to her character. We fancy we hear her uttering the first words that we have marked in italics, and clapping her hand on the table at the word "hundred." The mention of the trees and flowers comes in pleasantly at the conclusion, and completes the natural look of the writer, who was fit in her younger days to have been one of Burns's mistresses:—

'Kinrara, Perth, May 6th, 1809.

'Dear Sir John,—To do good is your motto, and at this moment you can do a great favour to Lord Macdonald. Mr M'Pherson (Dalwhoie), is most anxious to be appointed factor to his lordship. Had I the choice of a hundred, he should be the man. He is quiet, industrious, much-respected, well informed; and when any disputes arise among the lower ranks, he is always the peace-maker. He is regular in performing every moral and political duty. I have wrote to Lord Macdonald, and he may be assured he cannot find a better man.

'The awful events of each day fill me with horror; and the irritating neglect our great rulers shew to Scotland, will soon make us as bad as John Bull.

'There is a report that the Highland dress is to be given up. Adieu then, to the glory of the 42d and 92d regiments, and that noble spirit which distinguishes the sons of the mountain.

'I came to meet the spring and all her lovely children. Not a leaf on the fragrant birch; the hills white with snow, and the glass little above thirty. Shall I rejoice I am here? Books, peace, and solitude, are the blessings I value. My companion, Jane, is gay as a lark, and we are planting and watering every flower.

'I saw the best of wives, and the most lovely of daughters, the day before I left Edinburgh. Your's truly,

J. Gordon.'

Sir John's fair friends are gallantly followed by his naval friends. We find nothing in the naval correspondence worth extracting, except the following anecdote—

'Captain Swanton happened to command a 70-gun ship, The Vanguard (we had then no 74's in the service); and was cruizing with Admiral Hawke, off the coast of France, in the hopes of intercepting a French fleet from Louisburgh, when his ship was so damaged in a gale, that he was ordered home to refit; and in his way to Portsmouth, he most unfortunately came within sight of the very fleet that Hawke was in expectation of intercepting. The French seeing an English ship of war so much disabled, and apparently quite alone, thought it would be an easy conquest; but to ensure its immediate surrender, the Admiral, by a signal, detached an 80-gun ship and a 74 to take possession. The officers of the Vanguard, knowing the state of their own vessel, and seeing such a superior force coming, gave themselves up for lost, and said to the Captain, "It is impossible to stand against such fearful odds; we must make up our minds to see Brest."—"No, Gentlemen," said Captain Swanton, "a ship of this force must not be surrendered by a British crew, whilst there is any hope of safety. Go to your quarters, prepare for action, and let us fight it out to the last."

'No situation could apparently be more desperate. The French 80-gun came vapouring down, gave the Englishman a broadside, but was surprised to find, that instead of striking, it returned the fire with great spirit and effect. The 74, when it approached, met with the same reception. This astonished not only those two ships, but the French Admiral, and his whole fleet. They began to conjecture, that the disabled ship was merely a decoy, and that Hawke must be near, otherwise no officer in his senses would have made any resistance against so great a superiority; and apprehending, if the action continued, that their ships might receive so much injury, as to be an easy prey, if Hawke actually should appear, the French Admiral was induced to recall the two ships; and Captain Swanton, by his spirited and judicious conduct, was thus enabled, after beating off so great a force, to rescue himself from his desperate situation, and to bring his ship triumphantly into Portsmouth."—P. 198.

The military correspondence is of as little importance as the naval. Sir John, who is loth to be unacquainted with anybody or anything of importance, wished to know as much as he could of the battle of Waterloo, and took an excursion to the Continent for that purpose. He proposed to draw up an account of it, and applied for assistance to the Duke of Wellington, who gave him the following answer: which is candid:—

'I can give you no information that would be of any use to you. My mind was so completely occupied with the great events of the battle, that I could not pay any attention to its minor details. All that I can tell you is, that we met the enemy, that we fought a battle, and that we gained a victory.'

Sir John tells us that the best account of the battle of Waterloo is to be found in a work of General Muffling, which has been translated. He quotes with approbation a remark made by General Foy, who said that this famous conflict was "not a battle, but a duel." Sir John thinks this true;—

'For,' says he, 'there was no manœuvring, and nothing but sheer fighting. The duration of the combat gave the English army a great advantage; for although the French are equally brave, they have not the same bottom, or physical strength, as the English: and if a battle is protracted for many hours, the former have not the same chance of success.

'It is said that Grouchy was prevailed upon by Vandamme not to think of joining Napoleon (who, he said, would defeat the English without aid), but to march to Brussels for the purpose of plundering that city. If so, the ruin of Napoleon was partly owing to his having retained an officer in his service whom he ought to have discarded, as among the most unprincipled in his conduct of any that the French Revolution had produced.'—P. 220.

'CLERICAL CORRESPONDENCE.

'I propose dividing my clerical correspondence into four branches; 1. England: 2. Scotland: 3. America: and 4. France.'

This is like the beginning of some frightful sermon. What can be expected from clerical correspondence? How much sincerity? or anything else to the purpose? However, something is to be got out of it now and then, by the rule of contrary. The following is a specimen. Sir John got up a statistical account of Scotland, by the help of the clergy of that country. He wished to procure one of England by the same means, and for that purpose, when he formed the plan of his Board of Agriculture, he proposed that the Archbishops of Canterbury and York, and the Bishops of London and Durham, should be officially members; and that of two secretaries, one of them should be a clergyman of the Church of England, in order to carry on the statistical correspondence with his reverend brethren. The Archbishop of Canterbury, to whom the nomination was left, appointed the Rev. Dr Shepherd; but subsequently being told by somebody that the researches would include the subject of tithes, he immediately gave Mr Pitt to understand that "neither he, nor, he believed, any of the bishops would promote an enquiry in which the subject of tithes would be concerned;" and he withdrew his recommendation of Dr Shepherd, in the following sincere note:—

'The Archbishop of Canterbury presents his compliments to Sir John Sinclair, with many thanks for the papers he has done him the honour to send him. He has not troubled him with Dr Shepherd's address, because he is of opinion, on mature consideration, that the appointment of a clergyman, especially a clergyman who has a living of a cure of souls, to be an official secretary to any Board that will take up so much of his time, and is not entirely, or at least chiefly, occupied in matters relative to religion, is liable to much objection. He has, therefore, withdrawn his recommendation.'—P. 226.

'The opposition of the Archbishop,' continues Sir John, 'by influencing Mr Pitt, was fatal to the statistical account of England. No circumstance could have been more provoking, nor in a public point of view more unfortunate. There was not the least idea of interfering with the property of the church, either in regard to tithes, or in any other respect; and it was with the view of preventing any jealousy of the sort, that the leading members of the church were officially members of the Board.'

Ah, Sir John! Episcopal selfishness was more short-sighted than your accommodating philanthropy. It saw, well enough, that one enquiry would lead to another; as it has since done, in spite of the ingenuous letters of Archbishops, and the kind recommendations of Dr Rennell, that we lay our "understandings prostrate!"

ON THE LEISURE DESIRABLE FOR THE POORER CLASSES, WITH INCIDENTAL REMARKS ON PUBLIC-HOUSES.

[From an excellent Article in Mr Godwin's New Work.]

'It may be fitting to enquire as to the humbler classes of society, and those persons who are engaged in the labour of the hands, how much time they ought to be expected to consume in their regular and stated occupations, and how much would remain to them for relaxation and leisure. It has been said, that half an hour in the day given by every member of the community to manual labour, might be sufficient for supplying the whole with the absolute necessaries of life. But there are various considerations that would inevitably lengthen this period. In a community which has made any considerable advance in the race of civilisation, many individuals must be expected to be excused from any portion of manual labour. It is not desirable that any community should be contented to supply itself with necessaries only. There are many refinements in life, and many advances in literature and the arts, which indispensibly conduce to the rendering man in society a nobler and more exalted creature than he could otherwise be; and these ought not to be consigned to neglect.

'On the other hand, however, it is certain, that much of the ostentation, and a multitude of the luxuries which subsist in European and Asiatic society, are just topics of regret; and that, if ever those improvements in civilisation take place which philosophy has essayed to delineate, there would be a great abridgment of the manual labour that we now see around us, and the humbler classes of the community would enter into the inheritance of a more considerable portion of leisure than at present falls to their lot.

'But it has been much the habit, for persons not belonging to the humbler classes of the community, and who profess to speculate upon the genuine interests of human society, to suppose, however certain intervals of leisure may conduce to the benefit of men whose tastes have been cultivated and refined, and who from education have many resources of literature and reflection at all times at their beck, yet that leisure might prove rather pernicious than otherwise to the uneducated and the ignorant. Let us enquire then how these persons would be likely to employ the remainder of their time, if they had a greater portion of leisure than they at present enjoy.—I would add, that the individuals of the humbler classes of the community need not for ever to merit the appellation of the uneducated and ignorant.

'In the first place, they would engage, like the schoolboy, in active sports, thereby giving to their limbs, which, in rural occupation and mechanical labour, are somewhat too monotonously employed, and contract the stiffness and experience the waste of a premature old age, the activity and freedom of an athlete, a cricketer, or a hunter. Nor do these occupations only conduce to the health of the body, they also impart a spirit and a juvenile earnestness to the mind.

'In the next place, they may be expected to devote a part of the day, more than they do at present, to their wives and families, cultivating the domestic affections, watching the expanding bodies and minds of their children, leading them on in the road of improvement, warning them against the perils with which they are surrounded, and observing with somewhat of a more jealous and parental care, what it is for which, by their individual qualities, they are best adapted, and in what particular walk of life they may most advantageously be engaged. The father and the son would grow in a much greater degree friends, anticipating each other's wishes, and sympathising in each other's pleasures and pains.

'Thirdly, one infallible consequence of a greater degree of leisure in the lower classes would be that reading would become a more common propensity and amusement. It is the aphorism of one of the most enlightened of my contemporaries, "The schoolmaster is abroad:" and many more than at present would desire to store up in their little hoard a certain portion of the general improvement. We should no longer have occasion to say,

> "But knowledge to their eyes her ample page, > Rich with the spoils of time, did ne'er unrol."

Nor should we be incited to fear that ever-wakeful anticipation of the illiberal, that, by the too great diffusion of the wisdom of the wise, we might cease to have a race of men adapted to the ordinary pursuits of life. Our ploughmen and artificers, who obtained the improvements of intellect through the medium of leisure, would have already received their destination, and formed their habits, and would be disposed to consider the new lights that were opened upon them, as the ornament of existence, not its substance. Add to which, as leisure became more abundant, and the opportunities of intellectual improvement increased, they would have less motive to repine at their lot. It is principally while knowledge and information are new, that they are likely to intoxicate the brain of those to whose share they have fallen; and, when they are made a common stock upon which all men may draw, sound thinking and sobriety may be expected to be the general result.

'One of the scenes to which the leisure of the laborious classes is seen to induce them to resort, is the public-house; and it is inferred that, if their leisure were greater, a greater degree of drunkenness, dissipation, and riot would inevitably prevail.

'In answer to this anticipation, I would in the first place assert, that the merits and demerits of the public-house are very unjustly rated by the fastidious among the more favoured orders of society.

'We ought to consider that the opportunities and amusements of the lower orders of society are few. They do not frequent coffee-houses; theatres and places of public exhibition are ordinarily too expensive for them; and they cannot engage in rounds of visiting, thus cultivating a private and familiar intercourse with the few whose conversation might be most congenial to them. We certainly bear hard upon persons in this rank of society, if we expect that they should take all the severer labour, and have no periods of unbending and amusement.

'But in reality what occurs in the public-house we are too much in the habit of calumniating. If we would visit this scene, we should find it pretty extensively a theatre of eager and earnest discussion. It is here that the ardent and "unwashed artificer," and the sturdy husbandman, compare notes and measure wits with each other. It is their arena of intellectual combat, the ludus literarius of their unrefined university. It is here they learn to think. Their minds are awakened from the sleep of ignorance; and their attention is turned into a thousand channels of improvement. They study the art of speaking, of question, allegation and rejoinder. They fix their thought steadily on the statement that is made, acknowledge its force, or detect its insufficiency. They examine the most interesting topics, and form opinions the result of that examination. They learn maxims of life, and become politicians. They canvas the civil and criminal laws of their country, and learn the value of political liberty. They talk over measures of state, judge of the intentions, sagacity and sincerity of public men, and are likely in time to become in no contemptible degree, capable of estimating what modes of conducting national affairs, whether for the preservation of the rights of all, or for the vindication and assertion of justice between man and man, may be expected to be crowned with the greatest success; in a word, they thus become in the best sense of the word, citizens.

'As to excess in drinking, the same thing may be expected to occur here, as has been remarked of late years, in better company in England. In proportion as the understanding is cultivated, men are found to be less the victims of drinking and the grosser provocatives of sense. The king of Persia of old, made it his boast that he could drink large quantities of liquor with greater impunity than any of his subjects. Such was not the case with the more polished Greeks. In the dark ages the most glaring enormities of that kind prevailed. Under our Charles the Second, coarse dissipation and riot characterized the highest circles. Rochester, the most accomplished man and the greatest wit of our island, related of himself that, for five years together, he could not affirm that for any one day he had been thoroughly sober. In Ireland, a country less refined than our own, the period is not long passed, when on convivial occasions, the master of the house took the key from his door, that no one of his guests might escape without having his dose. No small number of the contemporaries of my youth, fell premature victims to the intemperance which was then practised. Now wine is merely used to excite a gayer and livelier tone of the spirits; and inebriety is scarcely known in the higher circles. In like manner, it may readily be believed that, as men in the lower classes of society become less ignorant and obtuse, as their thoughts are less gross, as they wear off the vestigia ruris, the remains of a barbarous state, they will find less need to set their spirits afloat by this animal excitement, and will devote themselves to those thoughts and that intercourse which shall inspire them with better and more honourable thoughts of our common nature.'

— In consequence of the boroughs, all our institutions are partial, oppressive, and aristocratic. We have an aristocratic church, an aristocratic bar, an aristocratic game-code, aristocratic taxation, aristocratic corn-laws, aristocratic laws of property; in short, the aristocratic spirit pervades everything,—all is privilege, prescription, monopoly, association, and corporation. . . . . How has it happened that the Aristocracy have been so extremely sulky in regard to the memorable events of last July; that they have kept their purse-strings so tight; that they have kept aloof from all participation in the general exultation? The second national uprising has been attended with no popular massacre, no confiscation, no obtrusion of irreligion; all has been valiant, wise, and moderate,—merely a great community rising, with one accord, to defeat an insane attempt to subject it to the yoke of despotism and superstition. Yet they have sent forth no carmen triumphale on the sublime occasion. Is it possible that they contemplate, at a distance, the mighty swell which is to submerge their own proud pretensions? If it be so, does it not show that their interests are personal; that they are not in common with the people; that they are merely a corporation in the state, and they feel their corporate immunities imperiled? But what is it that renders them insulated monopolists —strangers in the land? It is not the magnitude of their estates, for they are not objects of popular concern. No; it is not what they rightfully possess, but what they have surreptitiously obtained,—the franchises of the people, and the money of the people, which makes them fastidious and apprehensive. Be just and fear not, is our advice; and they are still safe!—Extraordinary Black Book.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

DRURY-LANE.—The Oratorio of the Messiah.

THE Oratorio of last night was the Messiah, which we have noticed already. We shall therefore make up our present article with a letter from a correspondent, and some remarks upon it.

TO THE TATLER.

'MR TATLER,—I offer no apology for again troubling you with my complaints, feeling confident, that if founded on justice, they will always obtain a place in your journal. As I before observed, your diurnal being partly devoted to the Stage, I address myself to it, as the best corrective of any abuse, mismanagement, or irregularity connected with it. The singing of Italian airs, cantatas, cavatinas, tersettos, quartettinos, &c. forms no inconsiderable part of the entertainments at the 'Miscellaneous Selections of Music,' alias 'Oratorios,' by which latter appellation these performances are more generally known—a word, by the bye, very unique, elegant, and harmonious. Now, Sir, it appears to me, that our vocalists, generally speaking, are far from being attentive to the pronunciation of this beautiful language—"La bella lingua Toscana." They fail in giving the vowels a full, clear, open sound, particularly the letter a. As far as my knowledge of the language goes, there is a great difference between the sound of this vowel in such words as amistà, carità, beatà, and in casa, padre, and cantate; therefore, as they do attempt to sing Italian, and are supposed to have studied under the best professors, a little more attention might be paid to the sound of the a and e, especially the former. They might remember that "per ben parlar Italiano, bisogna aprire la bocca." Many persons may not be aware of this defect, which, as the pieces are sung, is not so distinguishable, but it is not the less true. It may not be superfluous, while speaking on this subject, to remind these celebrated singers of what Milton says in his 'Treatise on Education.' "Their speech (says he) is to be fashioned to a distinct and clear pronunciation, as near as may be to the Italian, especially in the vowels: for we Englishmen, being far northly, do not open our mouths in the cold air wide enough to grace a southern tongue, but are observed by all other nations to speak exceedingly close and inward." It is, or ought to be well known, that this great author studied the Italian tongue most assiduously, and wrote in it "very acceptable and agreeable poetry," and was the more competent to give this advice—which may serve as a hint to many of our actors and actresses, to avoid mincing the words, not only in Italian, but in their own nervous language. Trusting that these cursory observations may not be thrown away, I beg to subscribe myself, Mr Tatler,

'Your admirer and constant reader,

'14th March 1831. 'PHILO-DRAMATICUS.'

The critics have long had a sense of the injustice done to Italian words upon the Stage. We are not aware of any difference between the pronunciation of the letter a in such words as obligato, and that of the final a in carita, fedelta, &c. except what may be made by the force of the accent; if that is what our correspondent means. In fact, it is nothing but the same intermediate a in both cases; the final accented a being only an intimation that the last syllable of the old word (caritade, fedeltade), is omitted. But on the English Stage, vowels and words of all sorts are murdered; and what was less to be expected, the authors conspire to keep up the massacre. Mr MILMAN, in his Fazio, calls Bártolo, Bartólo. The Times noticed, the other day, the villanous pronunciation of the name Manfredi, which the actors call Manfreedy. We are aware that there may be such a thing as a pedantic correctness, and that mistakes originating in times when there was a less general acquaintance with languages, are sometimes incorporated both with the text and with the reader's habits, in such a manner as not easily to admit of alteration. But when times are changed, and improvements are being gradually introduced in this very matter everywhere but upon the stage, it is surely reasonable time to begin there also. The knowledge of Italian Literature has been greatly spreading of late years, and members of the theatrical profession ought to be jealous of appearing less advanced in knowledge than the rest of the community. To many of the audience, an Italian name is never uttered on the stage, but it appears ridiculous. Nor is the absurdity lessened, by some words being spoken with a half correctness, and others altogether erroneously. It becomes rather the more provoking. A similar inconsistency, it is true, prevails among men of letters with regard to the spelling of Italian names. It is only of late years that Boccaccio has been called by his right name. Thirty or forty years back everybody wrote the word Boccace; or, as a pleasant friend of our's used to call it, Book-case. We still write Petrarch, instead of the noble word Petrarca. The reason of this inconsistency is obvious. It arises from the greater or less degree of popular acquaintance with the author's works. So, on the stage, the pronunciation of those names comes nearest the truth, with which the public have been rendered conversant by the residence of Italians in England, or which become difficult entirely to mispronounce, by the resemblance of their pronunciation to that of English words. But where there is an ambition to pronounce some words properly, it would be as well to extend it to all, especially where the whole language itself is so easy to pronounce as Italian. It would be nothing but a little pleasant pastime to some agreeable actress, to learn the proper pronunciation of Italian names from some native master; and no words would better become her lips.

But it is not the Stage only that is in fault. There is a mistake which the whole audience are in the constant habit of committing, and which, to an Italian, or to any one conversant with the language, or even with the Italian Opera, never fails to appear ludicrous. To say bravo! to Miss Paton or Miss Kemble, is as much as to say, "Well done, my boy!" It should be brava, to a lady; for the word is an adjective, and "hath genders." So, at least, the Italians themselves use it, though the word bravo is put in our Italian English dictionaries, simply as an interjection, unqualified. At the Italian Opera, they say "Brava!" to Miss Paton; "Bravo!" to Signor Lablache. A reform might be the more easily made in this particular, as we had the pleasure, the other night, of hearing it begun by a gentleman in the boxes, who applauded Miss Pearson. He was not one of her "indiscreet" friends, but the discreetest we have yet noticed; for though he applauded heartily, he was wise enough to say "No," to an attempt at getting up an encore.

By the bye, how comes little HARRIET CAWSE to have had no engagement at the Oratorios?

OSTRICH FEATHERS. — The greatest feathers of the ostrich are at the extremities of the wings and tail, and the largest of them are generally white. The next row is black and white, which is the prevailing mixture of colour among the species. The wings are of material use in aiding the bird to escape; for when the wind blows in the direction in which it is running, it always flaps them. In this case the swiftest horse cannot overtake it; but if the weather be hot, and there be no wind, the difficulty of outrunning it is not so great. When the ostrich runs, it has a proud and haughty appearance, and even when in extreme distress, it never appears in great haste, especially if the wind be with it. In a tame state, it is pleasant to observe with what dexterity it plays and frisks about. In the heat of the day, particularly, it will strut along the sunny side of a house with great majesty, perpetually fanning itself with its expanded wings, and seeming, at every turn, to admire, and be enamoured of its own shadow. During most parts of the day in hot climates, its wings are in a kind of vibrating or quivering motion, as if designed principally to assuage the heat. The feathers of its tail were once sought to increase the splendour of the Roman soldier's appearance. The same plumes are coveted as ornaments by modern Europe, and form part of the crowning graces of the female full dress. We know not at what period they first came up, but there is an Italian song, set to music in a very triumphant characteristical manner, which seems to have hailed their appearance on the continent; it begins

Quelle piume, bianche e nere,
Che sul capo voi portate,
Donne belle innamorate,
Vi fan crescer la beltà.

TALES OF OTHER DAYS.

By J. Y. A.

With Engravings, after Designs by GEORGE CRUIKSHANK.

"This is one of the most attractive publications we have lately seen; it consists of a series of remarkably well-written and interesting Tales of the olden time, with Illustrations by George Cruikshank. Of these Illustrations it is scarcely possible to speak in any other than terms of unqualified praise—they combine so much of the ludicrous and the terrible, and are so completely in Cruikshank's best style, that we feel justified in expressing an opinion that this publication will even add to that unrivalled artist's fame. The volume is altogether well got up—the printing is remarkably neat, and the Tales are of a pleasingly varied character."—Weekly Dispatch,

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

The Plays of Philip Massinger. Adapted for Family Reading, and the Use of Young Persons, by the Omission of the Objectionable Passages. Vol. III. 12mo. pp. 393. (Being the Third Volume of the Dramatic Series of the Family Library.) Murray.

This volume completes the works of Massinger in the present edition. Our first impulse, when we hear of editions with omitted passages, is to object to them, partly because we know not how much the editor may take upon himself to omit, and partly out of reverence for the writer's genius, which, it might be presumed, knew more of what it was lawful to utter, in a large sense, than men in general. To interfere with his workmanship seems like mutilating nature herself. We must own, however, there are some of the dramatists, who have allowed themselves such an extraordinary license of speech, that they have thrust aside all our tolerant speculations. Massinger is one of them. There are scenes in the Virgin Martyr, which, whatever excuses Mr Lamb may find for them, in the pure depth of his perceptions, (and no man's are purer or deeper), we could not read without feelings of the extremest disgust and impatience. He himself is glad that he can leave them out, in that beautiful book of his, 'The Specimens of Dramatic English Poets.' Speaking of the 'Virgin Martyr,' he says, "The very impurities which obtrude themselves among the sweet pieties of this play (like 'Satan among the Sons of Heaven') and which the brief scope of my plan fortunately enables me to leave out, have a strength of contrast, a raciness, and a glow in them, which are above Massinger. They set off the religion of the rest somehow, as Caliban serves to shew Miranda." This is true, but we hold the foil to be dangerous. What we object to such passages is, not that they serve to reconcile us to any aspect of humanity, however painful, (for in one sense of the word, it is part of the divineness of philosophy to view all things with an equal eye), still less that it serves to "set off" anything good and beautiful; but on the contrary, that it rather endangers the graces of it, and tends to pull them down. To attempt to set virtue off, by rioting in what nature has taught us to avoid, were like increasing the attractions of a lily by planting it in offal. There is also a resentment, and a re-action, of another sort, terminating in universal indifference.

Besides, in justice to an author himself, it seems hard that his reputation should be kept tied and bound in the accidental vices of his time: for as those were fugitive, so his fame is by its nature immortal; and this clog to it becomes especial matter of regret when it hinders him from making his appearance among those circles of the fair and young, whose very simplicity allies them to his genius, and makes them peculiarly fit to be his companions.

Without, therefore, implying that passages in celebrated authors ought to be omitted in general, or except for the greatest necessity, and upon grounds universally acknowledged, so as to secure them from the pedantry and presumption of the formal and dogmatic, we cannot help giving our applause to publications like the present, and congratulating the projector on the addition he is likely to make to the stock of delightful reading. The first work which he has put forward is in every respect most readably done. The size is just of the sort to be convenient to handle, whether over the fire, or out of doors; and for so small a page, the type is remarkably large; indeed so much so, that dim eyes will open themselves upon it with a thankful amazement. Our only objection to it is, that among the critical opinions, nothing is quoted from Mr Lamb or Mr Hazlitt; the two best dramatic critics, by far, that England has produced. Mr Hazlitt's name, for certain political reasons, not necessary to discuss on these pleasanter occasions, might not have been looked for, perhaps, so soon after his death: but Mr Lamb is as unpolitical as need be; and the small notes full of beauty, in his 'Dramatic Specimens,' would surely be a mean addition to that pleasant spirit of companionship, which the readers of a poet love to meet with in his commentators. The Editor before us, in his 'Life of Massinger,' has seen occasion to differ more than once with Mr Gifford; and the notes retained from the latter's edition, are of a reasonable paucity. But why should he be almost the only name quoted? The best of him amounts but to the ingenious, and is not to be compared to the others. However, we are thankful for the dramatist, the great man; and will not quarrel with the little dog at his heels.

The Editor has extracted from Malone's Historical Account of the English Stage a letter which that indefatigable person discovered in Dulwich College; and which, though not new perhaps to many of our readers, it is always interesting and affecting to look upon. The more we are aware that the great providers of intellectual entertainment for us have gone through the troubles and sorrows common to the most mortal of strugglers in this world, the more we relish their graces and spirit, and feel an honoured delight in admitting them into our hearts. Here is Massinger, one of the demigods of the race of Shakspeare, joining with two friends to beg the loan of five pounds, in order to save them from prison; and even those five pounds they had a right to ask for their services.

'To our most loving Friend, Mr Philip Hinchlow. Esq. these:

'Mr Hinchlow,—You understand our unfortunate extremitie, and I doe not thincke you so void Christianitie but that you would throw so much money into the Thames as wee request now of you, rather than endanger so many innocent lives. You know there is xl. more, at least, to be receaved of you for the play. We desire you to lend us vl. of that, which shall be allowed to you; without which we cannot be bayled, nor I play any more till this be dispatched It will lose you xxl. ere the end of the next weeke, besides the hindrance of the next new play. Pray, Sir, consider our cases with humanity, and now give us cause to acknowledge you our true friend in time of neede. We have entreated Mr Davison to deliver this note, as well to witness your love as our promises, and always acknowledgement to be ever

'Your most thankful and loving friends,

Nat. Field.'*

'The money shall be abated out of the money remaynes for the play of Mr Fletcher and ours. 'Rob. Daborne.'†

'I have ever found you a true loving friend to mee, and in soe small a suite, it beinge honest, I hope you will not fail us.

'Philip Massinger.'

Indorsed.

'Received by me, Robert Davison, of Mr Hinchlow, for the use of Mr Daboerne, Mr Feeld, Mr Messenger, the sum of vl.

'Rob. Davison.'

Massinger was the son of a gentleman in the service of the Pembroke family, was educated at Oxford, and became a writer for the stage; it is not known under what circumstances, but it is supposed under some disadvantage with his family patron, Lord Pembroke; owing to his having taken to dramatic studies in preference to severer ones. He was found dead in his bed, on the 17th of March 1640, in his house on the Southwark side of the Thames, near the Globe Theatre; and was attended to his grave by the players, of whom, like Shakspeare, Ben Jonson, and others, he had been one. The register of the church records him as "Philip Massinger, a stranger;" a memorial which has a pathetic look; but which probably means nothing more than that he did not belong to the parish. Sir Aston Cockaine says that he was buried in the same grave with Fletcher, in St Mary Overy's church (the same church as St Saviour's); but it is understood that Wood has the authority of the parish register for saying that he was buried, not in the church, but in the church-yard.

The following is the Editor's opinion of this dramatist. The

* 'Nat. Field. This celebrated actor played female parts. He was the author of two comedies. 'A Woman's a Weathercock,' 1612; and 'Amends for Ladies,' 1618. He also assisted Massinger in 'The Fatal Dowry.'

† 'Robert Daborne was the author of two plays: 'The Christian turned Turk,' 1612: and 'The Poor Man's Comfort,' 1655. He was a gentleman of liberal education, master of arts, and in holy orders. It is supposed that he had preferment in Ireland. A sermon by him, preached at Waterford in 1618, is extant.'

rank he assigns him is surely exaggerated to an extraordinary degree, and disproved by what he says at the conclusion:—

'The great and various merits of the works of Massinger will be better seen in the following volumes than in any elaborate critical dissertation. If our author be compared with the other dramatic writers of his age, we cannot long hesitate where to place him. More natural in his characters, and more poetical in his diction than Jonson or Cartwright, more elevated and nervous than Fletcher, the only writers who can be supposed to contest his eminence, Massinger ranks immediately under Shakspeare himself. Our poet excels, perhaps, more in the description than in the expression of passion; this may in some measure be ascribed to his attention to the fable: while his scenes are managed with consummate skill, the lighter shades of character and sentiment are lost in the tendency of each part to the catastrophe. The melody, force, and variety of his versification are always remarkable. The prevailing beauties of his productions are dignity and elegance; their predominant fault is want of passion.'—P. 19.

'Mr Lamb's opinion of Massinger is, that he "had not the higher requisites of his art, in anything like the degree in which they were possessed by Ford, Webster, Tourneur, Heywood, and others. He never shakes or disturbs the mind with grief. He is read with composure and placid delight. He wrote with that equability of all the passions, which made his English style the purest and most free from violent metaphors and harsh constructions of any of the dramatists who were his contemporaries."

Mr Lamb is also disposed to doubt whether the finest passages in the plays of Massinger, are not the property of his coadjutors, Decker, Middleton, and others. That exquisite scene in the 'Virgin Martyr' between the Angel and Dorothea, which we extracted in our article upon Angels (Tatler, Nos. 25, 26, 28, 29), he thinks likely to have been written by Decker: and the best scenes in the comedy of the 'Old Law,' which was written conjointly with Middleton and Rowley, he takes to be theirs.

'There is,' says he, speaking of the "Old Law," 'an exquisiteness of moral sensibility, making one to gush out tears of delight, and a poetical strangeness in all the improbable circumstances of this wild play, which are unlike anything in the drama which Massinger wrote alone. The pathos is of a subtler edge. Middleton and Rowley, who assisted in this play, had both of them finer geniuses than their associate.'

Mr Hazlitt is of opinion, that Massinger was far inferior to most of his contemporaries (all of whom, by the way, we trust we shall have in this present edition. It will give the town a new batch of great poets). Mr Hazlitt thinks that the ruling passion in Massinger is a principle of playing at cross-purposes. He accuses his genius of 'convulsive efforts of the will, or intricate contrivances of the understanding, to obtain that which is better left alone, and when the interest arises principally from the conflict between the absurdity of the passion and the obstinacy with which it is persisted in.' This critic, however, excepts particular passages from his censure, and has given great praise to the 'New Way to Pay Old Debts,' which he calls a 'very admirable play.' We will conclude with his opinion of it, and his masterly dissection of the character of Sir Giles Overreach:—

'There is considerable unity of design and progressive interest in the fable, though the artifice by which the catastrophe is brought about (the double assumption of the character of favoured lovers by Wellborn and Lovell) is somewhat improbable, and out of date; and the moral is peculiarly striking, because its whole weight falls upon one who all along prides himself in setting every principle of justice and all fear of consequences at defiance.

'The character of Sir Giles Overreach, (the most prominent feature of the play, whether in the perusal, or as it is acted), interests us less by exciting our sympathy, than our indignation. We hate him very heartily, and yet not enough; for he has strong robust points about him that repel the impertinence of censure, and he sometimes succeeds in making us stagger in our opinion of his conduct, by throwing off any idle doubts or scruples that might hang upon it in his own mind, 'like dew drops from the lion's mane.' His steadiness of purpose scarcely stands in need of support from the common sanctions of morality, which he intrepidly breaks through; and he almost conquers our prejudices by the consistent and determined manner in which he braves them. Self-interest is his idol, and he makes no secret of his idolatry; he is only a more devoted and unblushing worshipper at this shrine than other men. Self-will is the only rule of his conduct, to which he makes every other feeling bend: or rather, from the nature of his constitution, he has no sickly, sentimental obstacles to interrupt him in his headstrong career. He is a character of obdurate self-will, without fanciful notions, or natural affections; one who has no regard for the feelings of others, and who professes an equal disregard to their opinions. He minds nothing but his own ends, and takes the shortest and surest way to them. His understanding is clear-sighted and his passions strong nerved. Sir Giles is no flincher, and no hypocrite, and he gains almost as much by the hardihood with which he avows his impudent and sordid designs as others do by their caution in concealing them. He is the demon of selfishness personified; and carves out his way to the objects of his unprincipled avarice and ambition with an arm of steel, that strikes, but does not feel the blow it inflicts. The character of calculating, systematic self-love, as the master-key to all his actions, is preserved with great truth of keeping in the most trifling circumstances. Thus ruminating to himself, he says, 'I'll walk to get me an appetite: 'tis but a mile; and exercise will keep me from being pursy!'—Yet to shew the absurdity and impossibility of a man's being governed by any such exclusive regard to his own interest, this very Sir Giles, who laughs at conscience, and scorns opinion, who ridicules everything as fantastical but wealth, solid, substantial wealth, and boasts of himself as having been the founder of his own fortune, by his contempt for every other consideration, is ready to sacrifice the whole of his enormous possessions—to what?—to a title, a sound; to make his daughter 'right honourable,' the wife of a lord whose name he cannot repeat without loathing; and in the end he becomes the dupe of, and falls victim to, that very opinion of the world which he despises!

'The character of Sir Giles Overreach has been found fault with as unnatural; and it may, perhaps, in the present refinement of our manners, have become in a great measure obsolete. But we doubt whether even still, in remote and insulated parts of the country, sufficient traces of the same character of wilful selfishness, mistaking the inveteracy of its purposes for their rectitude, and boldly appealing to power, as justifying the abuses of power, may not be found to warrant this an undoubted original—probably a fac-simile of some individual of the poet's actual acquaintance.'—Hazlitt's Lectures on the Literature of the Age of Queen Elizabeth, p. 175.

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

"The little and short sayings of wise and excellent men are of great value, like the dust of gold, or the least sparks of diamonds."—Tillotson.

East India Monopoly.—Why should we be called upon to make a sacrifice? If the company cannot maintain their association without public support; if they cannot carry on trade to advantage, without privileges hurtful to the community; if they cannot enter into fair competition with individuals, let them retire from the contest, let them dissolve, and leave commerce to be pursued by others on more prudent and economical principles. Only think of the situation of that most patient of all animals, the British public, in this business. The Boroughmongers levy a hundred per cent tax on tea for the support of extravagance, and the payment of their dividends, and the company a monopoly tax to the same amount and for similar purposes. How finely is John Bull crucified between the "exclusives" of Leadenhall and the oppressors of Downing street! If to these agreeables we add the extra sugar-tax he is compelled to pay for the benefit of the West-India flageilants, with what gusto he must needs swallow his morning and evening beverage! what fervent ejaculations he must utter over his cups, for the prosperity and permanence of oligarchical government!—Extraordinary Black Book.

Mothers and Daughters in Normandy.—The constant and anxious surveillance which mothers and other elderly relatives exercise over the young women, is a positive proof of their frailty; for it is the remembrance of what they themselves once felt, and the observation of what is daily taking place around them, in spite of duennaship, which makes them thus suspicious and vigilant. They have, it would seem, no notion of that "deity in the bosom," which, in some countries, is supposed to be the best guardian of a woman's honour; and prefer depending upon material lets and hindrances to love. For this reason, the daughter, as I have already observed, if there be but one, always sleeps with her mother, goes to church with her mother, visits with her mother, makes love, or has it made to her, in her mother's presence. If there be many daughters, which seldom happens in France, they all sleep in the same apartment with their mother, who thus comes to be regarded in the light of a spy. It may be doubted, however, whether all this vigilance and restraint be productive of much good. The powers of invention, which are naturally very great in womankind, are only by these means made more active and vigorous; and many a girl of seventeen, who might under ordinary circumstances have been remarkable for her simplicity, is thus rendered a very Machiavel in the politics of love. These circumstances cause the women here to regard the state of marriage as the Lacedemonians did that of war,—as a state of liberty; and to plot, scheme, and long for it, as captives long for a delivery from bondage.—St John's Journal of a Residence in Normandy.

A Self-appointed Keeper of the Wardrobe.—Mr C. Hughes, a country comedian, had a wig which generally hung on a peg in one of his rooms. He one day lent the wig to a brother player, and some time afterwards called upon him. Mr Hughes had his dog with him, and the man happened to have the borrowed wig on his head. Mr Hughes stayed a little while with his friend; but when he left him, the dog remained behind. For some time he stood, looking full in the man's face; then, making a sudden spring, he leaped on his shoulders, seized the wig, and ran off with it as fast as he could; and when he reached home, he endeavoured, by jumping, to hang it up in its usual place. The same dog was one afternoon passing through a field near Dartmouth, where a washerwoman had hung her linen to dry. He stopped and surveyed one particular shirt with attention; then seizing it, he dragged it away through the dirt to his master, whose shirt it proved to be.—A Natural History, drawn from the writings of Buffon, Cuvier, &c.

AN AFFECTIONATE WOLF.—M. Frederic Cuvier gives a remarkable instance in which a wolf manifested for his master all the devoted attachment of a dog. The gentleman who brought him up from a puppy, and who was going to travel, presented him to the Paris Menagerie when he was full grown. For several weeks the wolf was inconsolable; but at length he contracted new attachments with those about him, and seemed to have forgotten his former owner. At the end of eighteen months, however, that owner returned, and as soon as the wolf heard the well known voice in the gardens of the Menagerie, he displayed the most violent joy, and on being set at liberty, he hastened to his friend. An absence of three years next took place, and the wolf was again disconsolate. The master once more returned, and though, it being evening, the wolf's den was shut up, yet the moment the tones of his friend met his ear, he uttered the most anxious cries. On the door being opened, he darted towards the long absent person, leaped upon his shoulders, licked his face, and threatened to bite the keepers when they attempted to separate them. When the man left him, he fell sick, rejected all food, was long on the verge of death, and would thenceforth never suffer a stranger to approach him.—A Natural History of the Globe, &c—drawn from the writings of Buffon, Cuvier, &c.

STEAM-CARRIAGES.—With horses certainly not effecting a rate of transit equal to ten miles an hour, exclusive of stops, we find the engine at twelve miles an hour, in eight hours performing the work of ninety-eight horses. And if we take the performance of the engine at fifteen miles an hour for six hours and a half, the number of horses required to perform the same work, will be one hundred and sixty-five horses; from which we see the impossibility of any competition between the two modes, at high rates of speed. These engines have just, or scarcely yet, perhaps, emerged from a course of improvements, as rapid as they have been astonishing. Little more than twelve months ago, we find them incapable of effecting any great rate of speed; four, and, at most, six miles an hour, being their ordinary rates of travelling upon the railways on which they had been introduced; and now we find their regular day's work averaging more than fifteen miles, and in one instance, a distance of above thirty miles traversed within an hour. With improvements such as these in progress, for every engine yet made seems superior to that preceding it, we need scarcely say, that it is extremely difficult to decide upon any fixed standard, without erring on either one side or the other. Perhaps, even before the work issues from the press, their capabilities may be very considerably increased.—Wood's Practical Treatise on Rail-Roads.

A ROYAL CORONATION.—The Hongo negroes in every district are allowed to elect a king and queen from among the individuals of their own nation. When the sovereign has died or resigned in the course of that year, a new one is chosen on the festival of Our Lady of the Rosary, (the patroness of negroes) and the person elected may be an actual slave, or a manumitted negro. These sovereigns exercise a species of mock jurisdiction over their subjects, which is much laughed at by the whites, but their chief power is shown on the day of the festival. The negroes of their nation, however, pay much respect to them. The man who had for several years acted as their king in Itamaraca, was about to resign, from old age, and a new chief was to be chosen. The former queen would not resign, but still continued at her post. The old negro who was this day to be crowned, came early in the morning to pay his respects to the vicar, who said to him in a jocular manner, "Well, Sir, so to day, I am to wait upon you, and to be your chaplain." About eleven o'clock I proceeded to the church with the vicar. We were standing at the door, when there appeared a number of male and female negroes, habited in cotton dresses of colours and of white, with flags flying, and drums beating, and as they approached, we discovered among them the king and queen, and the secretary of state. Each of the former wore upon their heads a crown, which was partly covered with gilt paper, and painted of various colours. The king was dressed in an old-fashioned-suit, of divers tints, green, red, and yellow; coat waistcoat, and breeches; his sceptre was in his hand, which was of wood, and finely gilt. The queen was in a blue silk gown, also of ancient make; and the secretary had to boast of as many colours as his master; but his dress had evident appearances of each portion having been borrowed from a different quarter, for some parts were too tight, and others too wide for him. The expence of the church service was to be provided by the negroes, and there stood, in the body of the church, a small table, at which sat the treasurer of the black fraternity, and some other officers, and upon it stood a box to receive the money. This was produced but slowly, much too slowly for the appetite of the vicar, who had not breakfasted, though it was now nearly mid-day, for he and his assistant priests were to chaunt high mass. He therefore approached the table, and began to expostulate with the directors, declaring that he would not go to the altar, until every expense was paid. * * * At last, their majesties knelt down at the railing of the principal chapel, and the service commenced. As soon as this was over, the new king was to be installed; but as the vicar was hungry, he despatched the matter without much ceremony; he asked for the crown, then went to the church-door—the new sovereign presented himself, and was requested or rather desired to kneel down; the insignia were given to him, and the vicar then said, "Now, sir king, go about thy business." As the king belonged to Amparo, the eating, drinking, and dancing were to be at that place, consequently in a short time our town remained quite quiet.—Koster's Travels in Brazil.

COMMENCEMENT OF MR COBBETT'S LETTER TO THE HAMPSHIRE PARSONS.—"To the Hampshire Parsons.—Parsons,—I have often taxed my powers of invention to find out another name for you; some appellation more fully descriptive of what you deserve; but after hunting about, backward and forward, I always come back again to "Hampshire Parsons," being able to find nothing, in all God's creation, to resemble the animal described by those two words."

A PRINCE'S FREEDOM.—The council did make remonstrance unto Queen Elizabeth of the continual conspiracies against her life; and namely of a late one; and shewed her a rapier taken from a conspirator that had a false shape, being of brown paper, but gilt over as it could not be known from a shape of metal, which was devised to the end, that without drawing it, the rapier might give a stab; and upon this occasion advised her that she should go less abroad to take the air, weakly unaccompanied, as she used. But the queen answered; "That she had rather be dead, than put in custody."—Bacon's Apophthegmes.

STRANGE COUNTRIES.—'I once heard,' says Mr Koster, in his Travels in Brazil, 'that a person who had been in England, and had returned to Pernambuco, observed that the two things which surprised him the most in that country, were, that the people did not die, and that the children spoke English. He was asked his reason for supposing that his first wonder was correct; to which he answered, that he never had seen the sacrament taken to the sick. The same story, or one very like it, has been told of an Irish traveller in France; but whatever may be the amount of Brazilian intellect, few Irishmen would have been dull enough to make such observations gravely. The ignorance of some nations with regard to others is, however, remarkable. It is not likely that the countries of Europe should long continue to be such strangers to each other; and it is to be hoped that travellers will not, in future, have such striking instances of this ignorance, to record, as the following:—"I had become very intimate with my friend the Major,—he learned from me that we had horses, and cows, and dogs in England, and he liked me the better for this; at first, he wondered how it happened that I could ride: he thought I must be an apt scholar to have learned since I had gone over to Brazil. He was also much surprised to learn that we had churches in England, which he had never understood before. He said he should not believe henceforward that the English were heathens." Such was the ignorance of a Brazilian Major twenty years ago; it was in 1810 that Mr Koster enlightened him. Knowledge has made the Tour of Europe since that time, and what she has not yet effected, will, no doubt, be speedily accomplished by the aid of Steam. All hail, great Steam!'

KING'S THEATRE.

"L'Ultimo Giorno di Pompei" the new opera by PACINI, which had been prepared last season for Madame MALIBRAN'S benefit, but was put aside in consequence of the late King's death, was brought forward on Thursday evening last for the benefit of Signor DAVID. We have little to say in praise of the composition of the piece as a whole—it is sombre, and unoriginal; being a feeble imitation of the ROSSINI school. The instrumentation possesses no energy, unless indeed mere noise and blare pass for such. There are no melodies worth recurring to again and again; no passages you detect yourself humming in your way home. The modulations, too, have all been common property of the Opera for years.

As for the plot of the piece, it is not worth the perusal, and still less merits the labour of detailing.

The most attractive feature in the representation is the eruption of Vesuvius; to which that at the conclusion of the Masaniello is as whistling to thunder, or a whisp of blazing straw to a conflagration.

Signors LABLACHE and DAVID were loudly applauded; the latter was encored in an air in the second act 'Oh! mio crudele affetto.' He sang with uncommon energy, but cruelly out of tune. The former in an aria, 'Se i Numi fausti,' almost roused the audience from their seats with enthusiasm: and indeed the correctness of his style, with the extraordinary power and beauty of his tone, fully warranted all their admiration.

Mrs WOOD'S voice was in "most blessed conditions;" brilliant, clear, and correct. She fully deserved the applause bestowed upon her.

The choruses in the opera scarcely deserve notice, except from their being ill performed. Indeed the piece has evidently been written exclusively for the principal singers; the orchestra and choruses being considered by the composer as third, or thirtieth rate affairs. All this shows but a limited feeling for the magnificence and true glory of his art. But PACINI and magnificence are strange words to be consorted. C.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

Journal of a Residence in Normandy. By J. Augustus St John, Esq. 12mo. pp. 295. (Being the 65th No. of Constable's Miscellany). Hurst and Chance.

We differ with Mr St John in his anti-bibliomaniacal objections to large histories of little places. We would have a large history of every village in England, written with all the research of an antiquary, and the fondness of a native. He should make us love and admire, if he could, every post in it; or if he could not, we would like him for the endeavour, and at all events, find something to add to our stock of agreeable associatious. There are people who might find fault with Mr St John for writing so much about the towns and villages of Normandy; but we shall not be one of them. If he had written a second volume, we should have read it: aye, or a third; though the first might be accused of some superfluous passages too. But any local history, with the least new ground in it, is interesting to us. Mr St John, we believe, has written more about Normandy than any other Englishman; and besides being glad to hear of any portion of the great family of mankind, with which we are not intimate, we are disposed, as book-men, to like the Normans for being the countrymen of Corneille and St Evremond; of whom, by the way, we should have been pleased to hear more from Mr St John, instead of so much about William the Conqueror. Our author is not a profound observer, but he is a lively one, and very good-natured. He leaves his study-windows open, for the robins to come in on winter nights; and is so companionable in stage coaches, that he is the first to converse even among Frenchmen. He says that there is a great mistake prevalent upon that point in England; and that Frenchmen can sit and be silent together, as well as their neighbours. This may be; but at any rate, they will talk when talked to, and England, we fear, still remains pre-eminent among the riders in coaches, for extracting an odd sort of gratification out of sulkiness and repulsion. Our beloved countrymen certainly have an art among them, not even confined to the brown sex, (which is a pity), that may be called the pleasure of being unpleasant.

The Norman peasantry are described by Mr St John as not altogether answering to the popular idea of the French character. They are, to be sure, a merry race, but rough in their manners. The Normans were always accused of being litigious. Boileau loves to twit them for it, the more, perhaps, on account of his dislike to Corneille. In gallantry, however, after their fashion, they appear not to be behind the rest of the nation. We proceed to extract from Mr St John's work the passages most illustrative of their manners, or otherwise containing such information or suggestions as we do not remember to have met with elsewhere. Our author's residence in this province commenced in the autumn of 1829. At the date of the following remarks, which was in winter time, he was residing at Cormelles, a village near the city of Caen:—

'Returning from Caen early in the evening, perhaps before eight o'clock, I used generally to observe every house shut up, and lights in the upper windows, indicating that the peasants were retiring to rest. In fact, during cold weather, they are most commonly in bed long before that hour. They have, indeed, no motive for sitting up late, the day being long enough for labour, and candle and firewood being extremely dear. Their modes of defending themselves from the cold are various. In the first place, every person in the country, male and female, that can get it, cheer themselves with eau-de-vie, the smell of which you may always discover as they pass you. In the next place, they clothe themselves, the women especially, with the thickest and heaviest garments, it being not at all uncommon for a woman to wear seven petticoats. They moreover wear, under the chemise, very thick knit flannel waistcoats, called tricots, with long sleeves, which come down to the wrists, and are turned up over those of the gown; these tricots, as well as every other article of female apparel, are generally of some very showy colour, as blue, red, &c. Even the frocks and trowsers of farmers, and the pinafores of children, are of a light bright blue.

Another mode of procuring warmth, common among the peasantry, and not altogether unknown in some parts of England, is, to take refuge in the cow-house and stables, where the breath of the cattle diffuses an agreeable warmth through the building. At Lions-sur-Mer, and other villages on the same coast, the lace-makers resort to the same curious practice to save fuel. They agree with some farmer, who has several cows in warm winter quarters, to be allowed to carry on their operations in company with the "milky mothers." The cows are tethered in a row, on one side of the apartment; and the lace-makers are seated cross-legged upon the ground, on the other, with their feet buried in straw. Opposite each girl, in a small niche in the wall, is a candle, placed behind a clear hemispherical bottle, the flat side of which is towards the candle, and the globular one towards the knitter. This bottle is filled with water, and throws a small stream of strong, pure white light upon the cushion, which renders the minutest thread of the lace, more visible, if possible, than by day. These cow-houses being generally too dark to allow of their ever working without candles, and the cattle being sometimes out in the fields by day, the lace-makers prefer working all night. Numbers of young men, of their own rank, resort to these cow-houses, and sit or lie down in the straw, by the cushions of their sweet-hearts, and sing, tell stories, and say soft things to them all night, to cheer them in their labours. The curé of the place, anxious lest the morals of his pretty parishioners should suffer, has more than once endeavoured to keep away the lovers, but in vain. To avoid, however, all real ground for scandal, the mothers and elderly female relations of many of the girls remain with them all night, pursuing the same occupation.'—P. 23.

All this care of the mothers, nevertheless, whether among poor or rich, appears to form no real security. A page or two afterwards we find the following:—

'It is not an uncommon thing, I was informed, for the women in the lower ranks to have children before marriage; and with one or two natural children they find no more difficulty in getting husbands than they do under similar circumstances in Tartary and Thibet, and are received among their fair sisterhood, whether before or after marriage, exactly as if they had kept themselves chaste. Their manners and conversation, moreover, are remarkably coarse. Among women of a higher rank, personal surveillance is not considered unnecessary. During courtship, the mother generally sits in the room with the lovers; walks out with them; goes to church with them; and, in one word, never quits her daughter's side, until she is fairly married. The other day, in a match where the lover was French, the mistress English, the gentleman, some time after he had obtained permission to pay his addresses, petitioned with much gravity, to be allowed every day, on entering and quitting the house, to kiss his mistress's cheek. The favour was granted, and the methodical and conscientious lover, never dreaming of over-stepping the bounds prescribed, gave his beloved two kisses per day. The courtship was carried on in French, of which the mother did not understand one word, and the daughter, very few; but the diplomacy of love, requiring but little aid from language, the business was conducted with facility, and terminated as it ought. If the mother, however, left the room for an instant, during the courtship, the lover, in the greatest alarm for the honour of his mistress, would start up from the sofa, on which they usually sat, and throwing open the door of the apartment, that the persons in the next room might have a full view of him, would pace to and fro, or stand as far as possible from the girl, until the duenna returned.

'When a marriage takes place, all the furniture, linen, plate, &c. is bought by the lady; and in these matters the Normans are extravagant. In humble life the girls frequently labour for many years to get together the sum necessary for furnishing their trousseau, as their contribution to the matrimonial stock is denominated; and are generally betrothed from a very early age, to some young man of the neighbourhood who does the same thing. The young lace-makers of Caen whom we see plying their fingers so merrily at the cottage doors, are all labouring for love. A great many of the young men of this department are stone cutters, and go up to exercise their calling in Paris, where, labour being more productive, they more rapidly acquire the sum supposed to be necessary for commencing house-keeping.

'I observed, a few pages back, that before the first hoot of the owl, the villagers are generally in the land of dreams; but, if they retire early to bed, they certainly make up for it by rising with the lark in the morning; though I cannot discover that the old adage,—

Early to bed, and early to rise,
Is the way to be healthy, and wealthy, and wise, is at all verified in their case, for, though they are healthy enough, they cannot be called either wise or wealthy.'—P. 27.

If they are healthy enough, in spite of their eau-de-vie, they have a good half of what wisdom wishes to obtain, and what riches cannot. But here is more of the same formidable matter as the last, which comes in awkwardly after what our author has said relatively to the care taken to avoid grounds of "scandal:"—

'From the statistical table published this year by order of the French government, it appears that more than one-sixth of the children of the department of the Calvados are illegitimate; while in Paris, the same class of children form more than a third. It will soon be a mere joke to marry at all in France; at least this will be the case when the illegitimate outnumber their rivals, which, as things are going on, must very soon happen.

'Voltaire complained that, in his time, the modesty of his countrymen had fled from the heart to take refuge on the lips; and he was no doubt a pretty good judge in those matters. At present, however, it cannot in general be said, that the lips of the ladies in France are by any means remarkable for their modesty, for they will speak of things that will put an Englishwoman out of countenance. At the same time, their dress is almost prudish. Even at balls and evening parties, their "robes" are only what, I believe, is technically called half-low, among the ladies. From beneath the neck of this, the rich lace of the chemise peeps out, like the leaves of the white rose, full and fragrant, and gives an air of delicate coquetry to the person. In the streets, on the promenades, and in the churches, the ladies of Normandy appear to much advantage. Though not generally handsome, and inclining a little too much to embonpoint, they have still an elegance, and, in spite of their size, an airiness about them, which render them agreeable to the eye, especially as for the most part their complexions are brilliant and clear.'—P. 60.

We must have another article out of this amusing volume.

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

"The little and short sayings of wise and excellent men are of great value, like the dust of gold, or the least sparks of diamonds." —Tillotson.

A Four-footed Pauper.—At a convent in France, twenty paupers were served with a dinner at a certain hour every day. A dog belonging to the convent did not fail to be present at this regale, to receive the scraps which were now and then thrown to him. The guests, however, were poor and hungry, and of course not very wasteful; so that their pensioner did little more than scent the feast of which he would fain have partaken. The portions were served by a person at the ring of a bell, and delivered out by means of what in religious houses is called a tour, a machine like the section of a cask, that by turning round upon a pivot, exhibits whatever is placed on the concave side, without discovering the person who moves it. One day, the dog, having only received a few scraps, waited till the paupers were all gone, took the rope in his mouth, and rung the bell. He repeated it the same day with the same good fortune. At length the cook, finding that twenty-one portions were given out instead of twenty, was determined to discover the trick; in doing which he had no great difficulty, for, lying in wait, and noticing the paupers as they came for their different portions, and that there was no intruder except the dog, he began to suspect the truth; which he was confirmed in, when he saw the animal remain very deliberately till the visitors were all gone, and then ring the bell. The matter was related to the community, the dog was permitted to ring the bell every day for his dinner; on which a mess of broken victuals was always afterwards served out to him.—A Natural History, drawn from the writings of Buffon, Cuvier, &c.

A Strange Taste.—I had sent a courier to them (M. de Rouffignac) to say that we should pass through the town between eleven and twelve at night; that we should stop at his door a few moments, and that we hoped he would have the chivalrous and romantic gallantry to give each of us a basin of good soup—a thing which would please me so much the more, as that method of paying court to the lady of his thoughts was not a common one. At the same time that he did what we desired, he found means of doing a very extraordinary thing: he kept a domesticated bear at his house, and having heard that nothing was so good as soup made of bear's flesh, he had his bear killed and soup made of it, which he gave us en parent. The soup was very red, but I have never tasted anything so good. I felt much obliged to him for the sacrifice of his bear, and for having rescued, on my account, the story of the Falcon of La Fontaine.—Memoirs of Madame de Genlis.—[La Fontaine must have strangely spoiled the Falcon story of Boccaccio, if this comparison be a just one. It is profanation to speak so lightly of that beautiful story, which, however, Madame de Genlis was not very likely to appreciate. For writing this passage, she deserves to have been fed on bear-soup all the days of her life, or rather upon nut-shells, for she confounds the shell with the kernel; cannot distinguish between soup and sentiment. The lover who sacrificed his falcon, would not have sacrificed it for Madame de Genlis.—A. A.]

Religious Liberty.—To govern Christianly is to establish perfect religious liberty, and free it from all risks. It does not exist so far as any civil or political consequences connect themselves with faith. If a king cannot change his religion, on the deepest conviction, without forfeiting his crown, that king has not religious liberty. The sceptre is a dungeon-bar to his mind, and the diadem a fetter on his soul. If a religious teacher may attain the station and emoluments of prelacy by his professed faith, and must forfeit them should his conviction change, that teacher has not religious liberty. Where one particular priesthood has rank in the state, others are not free; and where they all have, the people are not free. So far as the ceremonies of any particular faith are connected with filling the occupations, entering into the relations, or enjoying any of the advantages of civil life, there is not religious liberty. It is a fallacious distinction which has sometimes been drawn, that a state may patronise, though it should not punish. A government cannot patronise one religion without punishing others. A state has no wealth but the people's wealth: if it pay some, it impoverishes others. A state is no fountain of honour. If it declare one class free, it thereby declares other classes slaves. If it declare some noble, it thereby declares others ignoble. Whenever bestowed with partiality, its generosity is injustice, and its favour is oppression.—Fox's Christ and Christianity.

Lent in Brazil.—About the commencement of lent, the villages in the neighbourhood are almost entirely deserted by the white people, who return to town to see the processions customary at this season in catholic countries. * * * On Holy Thursday, accompanied by two of my countrymen, I sallied forth, at three o'clock, to see the churches, which are on this occasion highly ornamented. The whole town was in motion; the females, too, both high and low, were this afternoon parading the streets on foot, contrary to their usual custom; many of them were dressed in silks of different colours, and covered with gold chains and other trinkets, a general muster being made of all the finery that could be collected. The blaze in some of the churches, from the great number of wax tapers, was prodigious; the object apparently aimed at, was the greatest quantity of lights, as in some instances, mirrors were fixed behind the tapers. The middle of the body of these churches is completely open; there are no pews, no distinction of places; the principal chapel is invariably at the opposite end from the chief entrance, recedes from the church, and is narrower; this part is appropriated to the officiating priests, and is railed in from the body of the church. The females, as they enter, whether white or of colour, place themselves as near to the rails as they can, squatting down upon the floor of the large open space in the centre. The men stand along either side of the body of the church, a narrow slip being in most instances railed off lengthways; or they remain near to the entrance, behind the women; but every female of whatever rank or colour, is first accommodated. On the following day, Good Friday, the decorations of the churches, the dress of the women, and even the manner of both sexes was changed; all was dismal. In the morning I went with the same gentleman to the church of the sacraments, to witness a representation of our Saviour's descent from the cross. We entered the church by a side door; it was much crowded, and the difficulty of getting in was considerable. An enormous curtain hung from the ceiling, excluding from the sight the whole of the principal chapel. An Italian missionary friar of the Penha convent, with a long beard, and dressed in a thick dark brown cloth habit, was in the pulpit, and about to commence an extempore sermon. After an exordium of some length, adapted to the day, he cried out, "Behold him!" the curtain immediately dropped, and discovered an enormous cross, with a full-sized wooden image of our Saviour, exceedingly well carved and painted, and around it, a number of angels represented by several young persons, all finely decked out, and each bearing a large pair of outstretched wings, made of gauze; a man dressed in a bob-wig, and a pea-green robe, as St. John, and a female kneeling at the foot of the cross, as the Magdalen; whose character, as I was informed, seemingly that nothing might be wanting, was not the most pure. The friar continued with much vehemence and much action, his narrative of the crucifiction, and after some minutes again cried out, "Behold, they take him down!" when four men, habited as Roman soldiers, stepped forwards. The countenances of these persons were in part concealed with black crape. Two of them ascended ladders placed on each side against the cross, and one took down the board, bearing the letters I. N. R. I. Then was removed the crown of thorns, and a white cloth was put over and pressed down upon the head; which was soon taken off, and shewn to the people, stained with the circular mark of the crown in blood: this done, the nails which transfixed the hands, were by degrees knocked out, and this produced a violent beating of breasts among the female part of the congregation. A long white linen bandage was then placed under each arm, the nails which secured the feet were removed, the figure was let down very gently, and was carefully wrapped up in a white sheet. All this was done by word of command from the preacher. The sermon was then quickly brought to an end, and we left the church. * * * On Saturday morning we were saluted with the bellowing of cattle, the grunting of pigs, and the cries of the negro slaves with baskets of fowls of several kinds for sale; these were to be devoured after the ensuing midnight, and many families weary of their long abstinence, impatiently awaited the striking of the clocks, as a signal for the commencement of hostile operations, without mercy or scruple; upon turkeys, pigs, and all the rest of the miserable tribes which have been laid down as the lawful victims of our carniverous nature. Roster's Travels in Brazil.

KAMSCHATKAN BREAD.—One of the old chiefs brought me a large lump of what he called Karaikee bread. It was composed of the boiled bones of the deer, with the marrow in them, pounded very fine, and mixed with a small portion of the meat and fat. It was tolerably well tasted, and would have been really delicious, if it had not been for a smoky flavor that almost everything acquires which is prepared in their jourtas (the kind of hut or tent in which they dwell.)—Dobell's Travels in Kamschatka and Siberia.

— Mr Wright, the Editor of a work incorrectly lettered "Buffon's Natural History," mentions an interesting instance of restored sight, recorded in the Philosophical Transactions. It is of recent occurrence, and the only case on record of a person born blind being gifted with sight at so late a period of life. The patient was a lady who was born blind, and at the age of six months was placed under the care of an oculist, who operated upon both eyes, but without success. The right eye became inflamed, and was completely destroyed, and the left remained sightless as before. At the age of forty-six, this lady applied to Mr Wardrop, who, on the 26th of January 1826, performed an operation upon the left eye, which was twice repeated, and the third operation, on the 17th of February was completely successful. The patient returned home in a carriage, with her eye covered only with a loose piece of silk. The first thing she noticed was a hackney-coach passing, when she exclaimed, "What is that large thing that has passed by us?" In the course of the evening, she requested her brother to shew her his watch, concerning which she expressed much curiosity; and she looked at it a considerable time, holding it close to her eye. She was asked what she saw, and replied that there was a dark and a bright side; she pointed to the hour of twelve, and smiled. Her brother asked her if she saw anything more,—she replied, "Yes," and pointed to the hour of six, and to the hands of the watch. She looked at the chain and seals, and observed that one of the seals (a solid piece of rock crystal) was bright. The next day Mr Wardrop asked her to look again at the watch, which she refused to do, saying that the light was offensive to her eye, and that she felt very stupid, meaning that she was confused by the visible world thus, for the first time, opened to her. On the third day, she observed the doors on the opposite side of the street, and asked if they were red, but they were of an oak colour. On the sixth day, she told us she saw better than on any preceding day, but seemed bewildered, from inability to combine the knowledge acquired, by the senses of touch and sight, and was disappointed in not at once distinguishing by the eye, objects which she could so readily distinguish from one another by feeling them. On the seventh day, she took notice of the mistress of the house in which she lodged; observing that she was tall. She asked what was the colour of her gown, and being told that it was blue, replied, "So is that thing on your head, and your handkerchief is of a different colour," which was correct. The tea-cups and saucers underwent an examination. Her brother asked her what they were like. She replied, "I do not know, they look very queer, but I will tell you what they are in a minute, if I touch them. She observed an orange on the chimney-piece, but could form no notion of what it was, till she touched it." On the eighth day, she asked her brother when at dinner, what he was helping himself to, and when told it was a glass of port wine, she replied, "Port wine is dark, and looks to me very ugly." When candles were brought into the room, she observed her brother's face in the mirror; she also walked, for the first time without assistance, from a chair to a sofa which was on the opposite side of the room, and back to the chair again. Eighteen days after the operation, Mr Wardrop attempted to ascertain by a few experiments, her precise notions of colour, size, forms, distances, &c. When small pieces of paper of different colours were presented to her, she not only distinguished them at once from one another, but gave a decided preference to some colours, liking yellow best, and then pale pink. It may here be mentioned that, when desirous of examining an object, she had considerable difficulty in directing her eye to it, and finding out its position, moving her hand as well as her eye in various directions, as a person in the dark gropes with his hands for what he wishes to touch. She distinguished a large from a small object when both were held up before her for comparison; and said she saw different forms in various objects which were shown to her. On asking what she meant by different forms, such as long, round, and square, and desiring her to draw with her fingers those forms on her other hand, and then presenting to her eye the respective forms, she pointed to them exactly. She understood what was meant by above and below, and a figure drawn in ink, with one end broad, and the other narrow, being placed before her eye, she saw the positions as they really were, and not inverted. She could also perceive motion, for when a glass was placed on the table before her, if, on moving her hand towards it, it was quickly moved to a greater distance, she said, "You move it; you take it away." She seemed to have the greatest difficulty in finding out the distance of any object; for, when an object was held close to her eye, she would search for it by stretching her hand far beyond its position, while on other occasions, she grasped close to her own face, for a thing far removed from her. She observed some pictures hanging on the wall, and distinguished several small figures in them, but did not know what they represented. When a silver pencil-case and a large key were given her to examine with her hands, she knew each distinctly, but when laid on the table before her, though her eye distinguished the difference, she could not tell which was the pencil-case and which was the key.

QUEEN'S THEATRE.

THE new farce, called the Female Freemason, or the Secret Blabb'd, that was produced here last night, was heard with alternate applause and objection to the end, and finally condemned, the performer who came to give it out for repetition being rendered inaudible by cries of "Off! off!" We are sorry that anything should fail in this neat, pains-taking house; but we cannot wonder at the ill-luck in the present instance.

Mr Vintner (Mr SMITH), Deputy Master of a Freemason's Lodge, a cockney of the utmost beau ideal of cockneyism, who fears his wife, and says "Ve venerates the sex," is terribly beset by Mrs Vintner (Mrs HUMBY) to disclose to her the secret of the craft: in default of his doing which she threatens him that not a mason shall come near the house. Vintner discloses the perplexity he is in to his brother masons, and a plot is agreed upon to frighten her. Her husband accordingly tells her that she may become a mason upon condition of dressing herself in male attire, and not betraying herself. She consents; and a procession is formed through the room into which she is first introduced, consisting of successive portions of the Masonic body, each of which is accompanied by some dreadful symbol or instrument; and this phenomenon is duly explained to the lady, to her infinite dissatisfaction. One is a goblet of prussic acid, of which every new comer is to partake; another a stomach-pump, to secure the drinker against its effects; a third a mop and pail, to quench him and keep him moist through some fiery ordeal which he is to undergo; and a fourth a gridiron, on which, being conveniently heated red hot, he is to dance a hornpipe, with bare feet. After these awful visitations, the lady is blinded with "the cap of confidence," and conducted into the presence of the Lodge and Grand Master, who, after various mummeries, orders her to ascend the Grand Spiral Babylonian Staircase (a set of steps, to wit, some five feet high, which, by means of various twirlings of her as she goes up, she is made to take for an imminent deadly precipice). From this summit he orders her to jump off: she declares herself unbearably frightened, and entreats permission to walk off, as an unworthy aspirant; which is granted. She comes down, throws herself in a transport into her husband's arms, and her secret transpiring in the rapture, the Magnificent Acting Grand (or whatever he is called) takes occasion to give her a lecture on her sex's incontinence of speech; and the piece concludes with a chorus.

There are various reasons, we conceive, why this piece did not succeed. In the first place, the title evidently raised a good deal of expectation, for the house was fuller than we have yet seen it on the rise of the curtain, though the night was rainy. Secondly, the Freemasons that were brought upon the stage, were of what would be called a vulgar order, and not calculated to do the craft honour. Thirdly, the jokes upon women's not being able to keep a secret are old, and bad, and deservedly going out of fashion. As for that matter indeed, we believe women can keep secrets quite as well as men; and that whenever the latter have as little to occupy their time as female gossips, they gossip quite as much. Fourthly, no secret is "blabb'd" in this farce; and fifthly and lastly, there is nothing of any sort in the catastrophe worth raising so much expectation. This is one of the most perilous of all speculations on the stage. Any mystery, about which a sensation is made beforehand, ought to be of a consummate and most surprising kind, and quite overwhelming in the disclosure. The most mortal feature of all however, in the Female Freemason, we take to have been the vulgarity of the Lodge. No ridicule could have been intended by it; but it certainly had the effect of ridicule,—which must have chagrined the Freemasons; and the effect was flat, which annoyed everybody else. One or two of the choruses were not unpleasing.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 23, 1831.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

Journal of a Residence in Normandy. By J. Augustus St John, Esq. 12mo. pp. 295. (Being the 65th No. of Constable's Miscellany). Hurst and Chance.

[Concluded from yesterday.]

The following account of the clumsiness of manufactured articles in Normandy reminds us of a similar state of things in those parts of Italy, which formerly diffused the conveniences of life over Europe. The locks and keys, and articles on a par with them, in Tuscany, are perhaps the same now that they were in the days of Lorenzo de' Medici. The more cheerful a nation is in ordinary, or the happier its climate, the less it cares for those petty conveniences, which irritable people keep about them, as a set off to their want of happiness in the lump. A Norman or a Tuscan will be glad enough to make use of an English razor when he gets it; but the point is, that he can do better without it than the Englishman. We have sometimes seen in the face of an Italian, when English pen-knives and other perfections of manufacture have been shewn him, an expression, mixed with his wonder, of something like paternal pity, as if the excess of the thing was childish. It seemed to say;—"Ah, you can make those sort of things, and we can do without them. Can you make such knick-knacks as Benvenuto Cellini did,—carkanets and caskets, full of exquisite sculpture and worth their weight in jewels?"

"And there is reason in this. It is convenient to have the most exquisite pen-knives; but it is a greater blessing to be able to do without them. We would not stop the progress of manufacture; for a good will come of it, beyond what is contemplated: but it is not to be denied meanwhile, that the more petty conveniences we abound in, the more we become the slaves of them, and the more impatient at wanting them where they are not. Not having the end, we keep about us what we take for the means. Cultivators of better tempers or happier soils get at the end by shorter cuts. The only real good of the excessive attention we pay to the conveniences of life, is, that the diffusion of knowledge, and the desire of advancement, proceed in company with it; and that happier nations may ultimately become still happier by our discoveries, and improve us, in their turn, by those of their livelier nature.

'In the invention of several little things which add to the comforts, and facilitate the daily actions of life,' says Mr St John, 'the English are certainly before the French,—if French civilization can be said to have reached Normandy. The cutlery, for example, is generally exceedingly poor and clumsy; and every improvement which is attempted, is said to be made à l'Anglais. They mark their linen with English ink; they cut their beef-steaks and plum-puddings with English knives, when they can get them; and if they can scrape off their beards with English razors, they are but too happy. But, in fact, no man can be expected to be patriotic or national in the matter of razors; for, if the devil himself kept a cutler's shop, and sold a good article, I think no man who has a beard would scruple to become his customer. I was not able to discover a pair of nut-crackers in all Caen, though I am told such things have accidentally been seen there; and was compelled to send to London for a pair or two. The instrument with which filberts and hazel nuts are squeezed to pieces here, is exactly like a country cobbler's pincers, only not half so neat. Walnuts are opened with a knife, at the constant risk of lock-jaw. Fenders, of course, there are none; and the fire-irons are of the most rude and awkward construction. The ordinary earthenware is exactly of the description which, I suppose, prevailed before the siege of Troy, being at once ugly and brittle; but the porcelain and finer species of earthenware are frequently extremely tasteful and elegant. The manufacturing of glass seems by no means to have reached the perfection which it has attained among us, though many articles are cheap and pretty. But of all the clumsy fellows in the country, the locksmiths, I think, bear the bell. Nothing can equal the ugliness and coarseness of their locks and keys, if you except the manner in which they are fastened to the doors. In shoeing horses, also, the Normans are peculiarly inexpert. Three persons are invariably employed in the operation: one man seizes the horse by the head, another takes hold of his foot, turns it up, puts on the shoe, and holds it with both hands, while the third strikes in the nails, with a hammer large enough to have served the Cyclops in beating out the thunder-bolts for Jupiter in their smithy in Mount Etna. If the animal happens to move, the whole posse of artists are disarranged, and a thousand curses are showered upon his perverseness. The same number of persons are employed in shoeing an ass. In England, a smith who could not manage the whole business without aid, would hang himself for shame.

'Moreover, in walking along the roads in frosty weather, they are continually falling and slipping on the ice, for want of what, I believe, is called roughing their shoes. When this happens, the peasants beat the animal in the most brutal manner, though their own stupidity is alone to blame. When I have hinted at this piece of cruelty, I have had our cock-fighting, and bull-baiting, and boxing-habits, objected to me, and very fairly; though I do not clearly see how our cruelty to cocks and bulls can justify their savage abuse of the domestic animals. It is not difficult, however, to retort accusations of this kind. Every nation has its faults and its absurdities; and it is thus that mankind keep each other in countenance.

'The Normans, though remarkably backward in many of the practices of civilized life, are sometimes ridiculed when they do not altogether deserve it. For example, it is customary with the English here to laugh at them for harnessing their horses in a long single line of eight or ten to their waggons. No doubt it appears very absurd at first sight, but the practice is in consequence of the badness of the cross-roads and by-roads which are found in this country, and must be allowed until those roads are greatly improved. For, when a waggon drawn by a long team of this kind, comes to a slough in the road, the foremost horses enter it and pass it, before those behind are far in the mud; and thus, having reached the solid ground, are enabled to drag their brethren, vehicle and all, through the slough. In the same manner, we must account for the unusually great diameter of the wheels of these waggons. I have often heard General Miller explain in this way the custom of the Guachos, or inhabitants of the Pampas of South America, who use waggons with wheels ten feet in diameter, and yoke twenty pair of oxen, in a loose manner, to one of these strange looking vehicles. That the diligences are not drawn by a long single line of horses, is no proof that the practice is not the effect of prejudice, but a presumption, of the contrary: the diligences, in general, run over good roads and, when the waggons have the same advantages, they will be drawn by horses yoked two and two, as they are in England.'—P. 72.

'The ladies of Normandy wear whatever bonnets or hats happen to be in fashion at Paris, but the female citizens of a certain rank wear nothing but caps. This renders it necessary for every person to be armed against sudden showers with an umbrella, which, in most instances, is of a fiery red, or some other bright colour. These umbrellas are of a clumsy construction and remarkably heavy. I think an English umbrella manufacturer who should set up at Caen, and be moderate in his charges, would very soon make his fortune, as might also any other manufacturer of articles of utility.'—P. 132.

An English manufacturer might succeed, as the author here says; but he would have to adapt the colours of his umbrellas accordingly. Delight as well as convenience is of some consequence abroad; not because, as our author has taken some pains to argue in another place, the French are dull and require to be roused; but because they have a sympathy with pleasure. He thinks that the French, though not a melancholy, are a dull people, and that they are more social than we, because they have more need of society. Undoubtedly society is more necessary to dull people than to others; but it is also more natural to the sprightly. We take his mistake to have originated in confounding the average mass of understandings, which are, perhaps, pretty much the same in all countries, with the average, as it exists, in one country, perhaps even in one province. But to proceed with our quotation:—

'Besides the coverings of the head mentioned above, there is another, still more remarkable, perhaps, peculiar to the female peasantry; this is a monstrously high cap, made upon a shape like a bonnet, and kept upon the head by a piece of black ribbon, which, passing under the chin, like the strap of a soldier's helmet, is pinned to the cap on each side. Notwithstanding the masculine air which this cap, with its military appendage, gives the face, the peasant girls never look so well as when they have it on, especially when, as on Sundays, the long lapels, depending from the lofty crown on each side, are trimmed with rich lace, which is here worn by the meanest of the people.

'From these remarks on the costumes of the people, the reader will be able to discover that, from some cause or another, the distinctions of rank are still assiduously kept up in this part of France. A very striking illustration of this fact occurred at a public concert, given last winter at Caen for the benefit of the poor, where the performers, with two or three exceptions, were amateurs. Sometime after the audience had been seated, and the singing had commenced, some eight or nine persons belonging to the ancient and noble families of the country, arrived, and the whole house was immediately thrown into confusion, the company being requested to get up, and yield the front seats to their betters. All grumbled, some hissed, all sneered at their parchment titles to nobility,—but the greater number made way for them. Two or three, however, of the honest and sturdy citizens of Caen refused to get up or stir an inch, very properly observing, that, as all paid alike, no distinction should be made, and that, for their part, they did not care a straw for the nobility. The titled part of the audience was put out of temper by this circumstance, and, instead of listening to the music, sat down in dogged silence, brooding over the insult which had been offered them; and it was long before they recovered their composure. It is the feeling produced by such vulgar affectations of superiority, which tends as much as anything to destroy the ancient governments of Europe, and to render the aristocracy, the legitimate supporters of the throne, detested and detestable.'—P. 134.

Good. These are the gentry who would fain have the "good old times" back again. Of which take the following specimen. (By the way, there is a striking vignette in the title page of this same Mount St Michel).

'At the Mount St. Michel was preserved, until lately, the enormous wooden cage in which state prisoners were sometimes confined under the old regime. The most unfortunate of the poor wretches who inhabited this cage was Dubourg, a Dutch editor of a newspaper. This man having, in the exercise of his duty, written something which offended the dignity of Louis XIV, or some one of his mistresses, was marked out by the magnanimous monarch for vengeance; and the means which, according to tradition, he employed to effect his purpose, was every way worthy of the royal miscreant. A villain was sent from Avranches to Holland, a neutral state, with instructions to worm himself into the confidence and friendship of Dubourg, and, in an unguarded moment, to lead him into the French territories, where a party of soldiers was kept perpetually in readiness to kidnap him, and carry him off. For two years this modern Judas is said to have carried on the intrigue, at the end of which period he prevailed upon Dubourg to accompany him into France, when the soldiers seized upon their victim, and hurried him off to the Mount St Michel.

'Confinement and solitude do not always kill. The Dutchman, accustomed, perhaps, to a life of indolence, existed twenty years in his cage, never enjoying the satisfaction of seeing "the human face divine," or of hearing the human voice, except when the individual entered who was charged with the duty of bringing him his provisions and cleaning his cell. Some faint rays of light, such as enable cats and owls to mouse, found their way into the dungeon, and, by their aid, Dubourg, whom accident or the humanity of his keeper had put in possession of an old nail, and who inherited the passion of his countrymen for flowers, contrived to sculpture roses and other flowers upon the beams of his cage. Continual inaction, however, though it could not destroy life, brought on the gout, which rendered the poor wretch incapable of moving about from one side of the cage to the other; and he observed to his keeper, that the greatest misery he endured was inflicted by the rats, which came in droves, and gnawed away at his gouty legs, without his being able to move out of their reach, or frighten them away.'—P. 223.

After this picture, will properly come the following striking remarks on the French coins, the conclusion of which, in particular, is highly creditable to the author; as well as to the noble people of whom he is speaking:—

'A stranger who looks at all the things which surround him, cannot fail to be struck by the singular variety of images and superscriptions which he sees upon the money of France. On one piece, he will perceive the heavy countenance, retreating forehead, hooked nose, and open, foolish-looking mouth of "Charles X, Roi de France;" and on the reverse three fleur de lis on a waved field, surmounted by a crown, with two laurel branches curling round it, date 1825. On another, he will see the haughty, scornful, intellectual face of the late great military despot, with the laurel wreaths won in many a hard fought field, about his temples, and the superscription of "Napoleon, Empereur." On the reverse, a wreath of laurel surrounding the designation of the coin, and the words "Empire Français" meet the eye. Upon the edge of the legitimate coin we discover the spirit of the ancient monarchy, during which the King was accounted the state in all its nakedness:—"Domine salvum fac regem!" Instead of this pedantic display of self-love, Napoleon, with grateful and judicious flattery, expresses his conviction that Heaven interests itself in the destinies of his country:—"Dieu protège la France," says he. Another imperial coin exhibits on the reverse a souvenir of liberty, in the words "Republique Française, An. XIII." Upon another piece, date 1823, we have the effigy of Louis XVIII, with a double chin, hooked nose, retreating forehead (a truly royal feature), and quiet, good-natured countenance. We then take up the coin of the year V, with its thrilling, startling obverse, upon which no vestige of royalty appears; but, instead, a gigantic male figure, with a sombre and somewhat savage countenance, embracing with his right hand a female, who bears the cap of liberty upon a wand. * * *

'The striking variety in the images and superscriptions found upon the coins is an outward and visible sign of the inward temper of the souls of the people; some wear the badges of legitimacy, like the mark of the beast in the Revelation: some are twined, as it were, into the chains of Napoleon; but by far the greater, I think, at least of those who have any opinion or character of their own, are distinguished by an inextinguishable love of freedom, which every day acquires new strength, as it grows more enlightened. I have, in fact, met with no example of a Frenchman, who was not more or less attached to liberty, more especially among the young and stout-hearted Normans, and who did not as strongly disapprove of the government of Napoleon as I do myself; though they were always ready to do justice to the vastness of his genius, and the general policy of his conduct.'—P. 67.

For such a despot as Charles X, one feels contempt and aversion. Napoleon makes one ashamed. We conclude with another specimen of the secret and shabby war, which this mistaken soldier thought fit to wage with all the chances of mankind, but such as he chose to give them:—

'The laws of France, both civil and ecclesiastical, absurdly meddle with the names which parents bestow on their children; the former confining the choice of parents to the names of the saints mentioned in the calendar, and the celebrated personages of ancient history; the latter, to the names of such saints as the church honours with public worship. For some mysterious reason which is not even hinted at, the curés of parishes are directed to take care that no Pagan appellation be bestowed upon an infant. The names of Socrates and Aristides are therefore proscribed in France. This law dates as far back as the year XI (1803) and consequently, is a specimen of Napoleon's wisdom. The most laughable part of the whole is, that by this masterpiece of legislation, those persons who, at the promulgation of the law, happened to bear heterodox names, were invited to change them for new ones.'—P. 43.

We thank Mr St John for his pleasing work, and should be glad to have one of the same sort upon every province in France. Why does he not go the circle? We venture to say that each volume would be better than the preceding one, for our author seems to be a humanist in no common sense of the term, and such men are always as willing to learn as to teach. The observation is Chaucer's; who says of one of the brotherhood of book-worms,

"Sounding in moral virtue was his speech,
And gladly would he learn, and gladly teach."

Leader, Mr WEICHSEL.—Conductor, Sir GEORGE SMART.

The performance of the oratorio of The Last Judgment, on Monday evening, must have shaken the opinion of those who maintain that SPOHR is deficient in melody. About two-thirds of this noble composition were performed upon the present occasion; and if the applause which followed each movement, with the animated call for encores, be any test of success (particularly from the Philharmonic audience) this great musician has obtained a triumph in phlegmatic England. The fact is, SPOHR is not a writer for extempore listeners; persons who are satisfied with such music only as is all surface, and can be comprehended at a glance: he must be studied, his intention must be weighed, and it will almost invariably be found that he has taken a profound and poetical view of his subject. Like our own far-thoughted COLERIDGE, the deep beauty of his sentiments opens upon you like the unbosoming of a rose. So of this his last great work, written we believe about the time when a report reached us that he had been attacked with paralysis,—a satisfactory refutation of so sad a rumour,—every phrase in it will bear close examination for the purpose of observing its author's poetical appreciation of his subject. This is, it is true, an ipse dixit, and in a publication confined as our's is in its limits, neither time nor space is afforded to enter into a critical analysis; but the reader may, if he feel incited to the task, examine the passages we shall quote in confirmation of our opinion. In the first place, the Overture, the first movement of which is in D minor, and in the second changes to the major, is a very original composition of a grave character, and full of masterly counterpoint. The opening chorus, 'Praise his awful name,' interrupted with the soprano and bass solo, 'Mighty he cometh to judgment,' and 'Fear thee not, O man!' are all full of energy and meaning. The point leading off in the bass upon the words 'He alone is mighty,' will delight every lover of the lofty and 'resonant fugue.' The treble solo and chorus, 'All glory to the Lamb that died,' is a charming movement in four flats, and in compound common time. The tenor solo and chorus, in the key of E 4 sharps, 'Blessing and honour, glory and power," is one of the most elegant and fascinating in the oratorio: it will probably become a favourite at the provincial festivals. This movement at all events contains a lovely melody, and the chorus, an admirable fugue leading off in the bass upon the same words.

Another specimen of melody and exquisite pathos will be found in the soprano and tenor duet, 'Forsake me not in this dread hour.' The expression of the words, 'Thou art my hope,' and, 'Oh spare thy servant, cast him not away,' according to our feelings, falls little short of absolute perfection. It was charmingly sung by Mrs KNYVETT and Mr VAUGHAN, and encored.

The most gigantic effort in the piece appears in the chorus, 'Destroyed is Babylon the mighty!' Here a fugue upon a striking and tremendous subject starts upon the words, 'The smoke of her torment ascendeth for evermore.' This is occasionally interrupted by the appalling exclamations—'Now, now! is the Lord at hand!' then the subject changes, with a fine modulation upon the words, 'The grave gives up its dead! the sea gives up its dead!' The whole movement concluding with an instrumental description of the final ruin of all things; a piece of musical painting of the sublimest class. As the convulsion and the thunder subside into low mutterings and intermitted sighs, a solitary voice is heard, with pathetic simplicity pronouncing, 'It is ended!' After this succeeds a most exquisite quartett, 'Blest are the departed, who in the Lord are sleeping.' The cadence in semitones upon the last word, "sleeping," is singularly beautiful; and to the expression of the passage, "their works follow them," we know no equal, unless it be in the cadence of the 'Recordare.' The soli and chorus, in piano, take the subject from each other with enchanting effect upon the words, 'from henceforth for evermore.' This movement, which derives an additional charm from the remote key in which it is written, viz. G six flats, was encored. The two last grand choruses, 'Great and wonderful are thy works,' and, 'Thine is the kingdom, the power, &c.' are noble fugues in the finest of all schools—that in which HANDEL sat on the first form. We have not space left to describe them; and indeed we find that the remaining features of the evening's performance must be postponed to another TATLER. It would be an ungracious deed, at the fag end of an article, to notice the CHEVALIER NEUKOMM'S admirable symphony. This therefore, with other matter, we shall return to at the first opportunity; concluding for the present with expressing our satisfaction, and thanks to the orchestra, instrumental and vocal. The choruses were well sung (and they were "parlous rough things" to encounter) and the whole performance went off admirably. We consider it an important step made in this country, in favour of sterling music.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

DRURY-LANE.—Henri Quatre.—High Ways and by Ways.—And the Illustrious Strangers.

COVENT GARDEN.—Cinderella.—Saint Patrick's Day.—And Teddy the Tiler.

IN default of having anything better to write about in our present number, we beg leave to remonstrate with certain bonnets, and other enormities, with which the ladies put out our eye-sight in the theatres. The bonnet is the worst. If you sit right behind it, it shall swallow up the whole scene. It makes nothing of a regiment of soldiers, or a mountain, or a forest, or a rising sun; much less of a hero, or of so insignificant a thing as a cottage, and a peasant's family. You may sit at the theatre a whole evening, and not see the leading performer. LISTON'S face is a glory obscured. The persons in your neighbourhood, provided they have no bonneted ladies before them, shall revel in the jocose looks of FARREN or DOWTON, and provokingly reflect the merriment in their own countenances, while you sit and rage in the shade. If you endeavour to strain a point, and peep by the side of it, ten to one (since Fate notoriously interferes in little things, and delights in being "contrary," as the young ladies say)—ten to one but the bonnet seizes that very opportunity of jerking sideways, and cutting off your resources. We have seen an enthusiastic play-goer settle himself in his seat, and evidently congratulate himself at the evening he was about to enjoy, when a party of ladies swimming into the seats before him, one of them has been the ruin of all his prospects. Even a head-dress, without the bonnet, shall force you to play at bo-peep with the stage half the evening; now extinguishing the face of some favorite actress, and now abolishing a general or a murder. The other night, at the Queen's Theatre, we sometimes found ourselves obliged to peep at the Freemasons in a very symbolical manner, through the loops of a lady's bows. But the bonnet is the enormity. And we are sorry to say that the fair occupants who sit inside them, like the lady in the lobster, too often shew a want of gallantry in refusing to take them off, for, as we have said more than once, we hold gallantry, like all the other virtues, to be a thing mutual, and of no sex; and that a lady shews as much want of gallantry in taking advantage of the delicacies observed towards her by the gentlemen, as a man does who presumes upon the gentleness of a lady. We felt, the other night, all the reforming spirit of our illustrious predecessors of the Tatler and Spectator roused within us, and, in the same exact proportion to our regard for the sex, upon witnessing the following prodigious fact:—A lady who came with a party into one of the boxes at Covent Garden, joined very heartily in expressing her disapprobation of some person in a seat below her, who was dilatory in taking off his hat. It chanced that this lady got into the very seat that he had occupied, and her bonnet turning out to be a much greater blind than the hat, what was the astonishment and the merriment of the complainants, upon finding that she was still less accommodating than the gentleman? Nothing could induce her to perform the very same piece of justice which she had joined in demanding from the other.

We are aware that in modern, as in ancient theatres, ladies come to be seen as well as to see:

"Spectatum veniunt, veniunt spectentur ut ipsæ."

But we are desirous that they should not pay themselves so ill a compliment as to confound their dresses with themselves; it is the bonnets that are seen, in these cases, and not the ladies. When seen themselves, they make a part of the spectacle, but who cares to look upon these great lumps of gause and silk? Something, we grant, is to be allowed to fashion, but the wearers might be content with showing that their heads could be as absurd as other people's, and then lay aside the absurdity, and show that they understood the better part of being reasonable. They urge, when requested to take their bonnets off, that they "cannot" do it; meaning, we suppose, besides the will not, which cannot so often signifies, that their heads are not prepared to be seen—that their hair is not dressed in the proper manner; but it would be easy to come with it so dressed; the bonnet is not the only head-dress in fashion; and above all, it would be a graceful and a sensible thing in them to remember, that in coming to a place where the object is to enjoy pleasure, their own capability of pleasure is interested in considering that of others. We never feel angry with a woman, except when she persists in doing something to diminish the delight we take in complimenting the sex.

AN ENEMY'S OPINION WORTH REGARDING.—Discover the opinion of your enemies, which is commonly the truest; for they give you no quarter, and allow nothing to complaisance.—Dryden.

RIBALDRIES OF THE OLD WRITERS.—The ribaldries which disfigure our elder dramatists would be without excuse and would not be tolerated in modern writings. In extenuation of the former, however, it should always be recollected that they imitated the conversation and manners of the day, and it is even possible, that without direct intention, they may even have been partly instrumental in correcting the evil, by rendering the offensive practice more obvious to censure. NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

Journal of a Residence in Normandy. By J. Augustus St John, Esq. 12mo. pp. 295. (Being the 65th No. of Constable's Miscellany). Hurst and Chance.

[Concluded from yesterday.]

We return to this book once more to give our author's interesting account of his journey to Mount St Michael, which, besides being complete in itself, presents some novel features of scenery. We omit only the passages relating to the infamous dungeon, which we inserted yesterday.

Mr St John might have given a poetical finish to his description by telling us what he could learn of a line in Milton which applies to this Mount St Michael, as well as to the other in Cornwall. The old monastery on the latter was an appendage to that of the one in France; and the vision of St Michael, in which it originated, used to be seen in both places. Milton represents it as seated, and looking over the sea towards the coast of Spain.

"The great vision of the guarded mount;"

'Breakfasting in haste, I procured a horse and a guard, and set out for the Mount, no less celebrated for its historical importance, than for the peculiarity of its position; as soon as I had emerged from the streets of Avranches, I saw before me a vast bay, now entirely deserted by the tide, and consisting partly of sand, partly of slime, intersected by the waters of several rivers, and covered, during spring tides, at high water. Two promontories, the one bluff and rocky, the other sandy and low, project, one on either hand, into the sea, and in the open space between these two points are two small islands, from around which the sea ebbs at low water: one of them is a desert rock, called the Tombeline, and the other the Mount St Michael. The space thus covered and deserted alternately by the sea, is about eight square leagues, and is here called the Grève.

'The Mount St Michael, which is about the same height as the Great Pyramid of Egypt, and now stands, as that does, upon a vast plain of sand, which is here, however, skirted in its whole length by the sea, has a very striking and extraordinary aspect. It appeared, as the water was so close behind it, to rise out of the sea, upon the intense and dazzling blue of which its grey rocks and towers were relieved in a sharp and startling manner; and as I descended lower and lower on the hill side, and drew nearer the beach, its pinnacles seemed to encrease in height, and the picturesque effect was improved.

'At length I emerged from the shady road upon the naked beach, and saw the ferry-boat and charon that were to convey me and my charger over the first river. My Avranches guide here quitted me; but I had been told that the ferryman himself usually supplied his place in piloting strangers across the quick-sands, which, owing to the shifting of the course of the rivers, are in constant change, and of the most dangerous character. Horses and their riders, venturing to select their own path over the sands, have been swallowed up together; and vessels stranded here in a tempest, have in a short time sunk and disappeared entirely. The depth of what may perhaps be termed the unsolid soil, is hitherto unknown, though various attempts have been made to ascertain it. In one instance, a small mast, forty feet high, was fixed up in the sands, with a piece of granite of considerable weight upon the top of it, but mast, granite and all, rapidly disappeared, leaving no trace behind. It is across several leagues of a beach of this nature, that one has to approach the Mount St Michael.

'Though the rivers one has to traverse are neither very deep nor very broad, the mere fact of their rolling over a bed of dangerous quick-sands, invest them with a kind of importance, which they would otherwise undoubtedly not possess. The ferryman, as stupid a looking fellow as one could see in a summer's day, informed me, that being that day left in charge of the boat, he could not himself be my guide, but that, by accompanying an old man who had just crossed, and was making the best of his way over the sands, I should find a small village, where there would be no difficulty in meeting with a guide. With this information, I put my Rosinante in motion, in order to overtake the old man, who was already some distance upon the sands; but I had no sooner set out, than the Charon called after me, saying, that for three francs he would leave his boat and go with me. "Very well, my man," I replied, "come along. But he requested me to wait a moment, till he should call his uncle, to superintend the concerns of the ferry. I consented, and raising his voice to the highest pitch, he made himself heard in a distant cottage, whence two voices replied, that the uncle would not or could not come. He had previously taken care to inform me that I had no time to lose, as the tide was already beginning to flow, and in the course of two hours, would entirely surround the mount, and not only render all ingress or egress impossible, but moreover endanger the lives of such unhappy wights as it might overtake upon the sands. Notwithstanding this important piece of information, I sat patiently upon my horse, who, for his part, was in no hurry, and did not attempt to interrupt the dialogue, between the ferryman and his friends in the cottage. Seeing that I made no offer to double the three francs, with a view to which the above-mentioned manœuvre was put in practice, the honest man informed me candidly, that he could not go with me, but that I might find my way very well over the sands, by following the old man, who had now diminished, by the effect of distance, to the size of a gull.

'It was somewhat fortunate for me, that the quicksands, did not lie exactly in my way; for my charger, who had been always accustomed to trot after a guide, no sooner lost sight of the biped, than he became more obstinate than Balaam's ass, and stood still to enjoy the prospect. It was in vain that I spurred and whipped, he merely reared, and snorted, and kicked, without making the least attempt to advance. It had been exceedingly hot all the morning, and I began to suppose that the animal, being concerned on my account, was inclined to give me time to cool; so I took the hint, and sat quite at my ease, gazing about me. Patience, however, as some philosopher has said, is a virtue which is never so shy as when one is in need of it; and, as I looked at the mount, and the tide beyond it, mine began to desert me, and I again had recourse to the horsewhip—but still to no purpose; the obstinate animal merely groaned, which was as much as to say, "he'd be beat if he'd stir!" As this idea struck me, another equally judicious came along with it, which was, that in order to put the self-willed brute into motion, I must swear it in French, and I immediately did; and the creature, as if refreshed and invigorated by the sound; darted off at once in the proper direction. Having now discovered the secret of the perpetual motion, I used it unsparingly; and with the aid of a few figures of speech of this kind, and an active application of the whip, I crossed the second stream, and found myself upon the other beach, upon the point of Pontorson.

'In a short time, I overtook the old peasant, that had crossed the river with me, who directed me to proceed to the village near the point, where, by enquiring for Dequettes, the fisherman, I should find a safe and obliging guide. I did as I was advised, and found an active and civil young man, about nineteen, who, taking a kind of harpoon in his hand, with which to try the sands, struck out upon the Grève, and led the way towards the mount.

'The scene which now presented itself was singular and beautiful. On the right, the land running out boldly into the sea, offered, with its rich verdure, a striking contrast to the pale yellow sand beneath. In front, the sea-blue calm, waveless, and studded in the distance with a few white sails glittering in the sun, ran in a straight line along the yellow plain, which was, moreover, intersected in various directions by numerous small rivers, whose shining waters looked like molten silver. To add to the effect of the landscape, silence the most absolute brooded over it, except when the scream of the seamew, wheeling about drowsily in the sunny air, broke upon the ear. The Mount itself, with its ancient monastic towers rearing their grey pinnacles towards heaven, in the midst of the stillness and the solitude, appeared to be formed by nature to be the abode of peace, and a soft and religious melancholy.

'For some time I rode on musing, gazing delightedly at the scene, and recalling to mind the historical events which had taken place on those shores, and rendered them famous. The cannon of England had thundered on every side, and her banners had waved triumphantly from the towers before me. My reflections, however, were soon called off from these towering topics, being interrupted by the loud laugh of a party of soldiers and waggoners, who were regaling themselves with fresh air at the gate of the fortress.

'Dismounting here, I entered the small town which clusters round the foot of the mount within the wall; and whatever romance might have taken lodging in my imagination, was quickly put to flight by the stink, and filth, and misery which forced themselves upon my attention. I never beheld a more odious den. Leaving my horse and guide at a cabaret, I ascended the only street in the place, which, winding about the foot of the mountain, leads directly to the castle. Toiling up this abominable street, and several long and very steep flights of steps, I at length reached the door, where, having rung, and waited for some time, I was admitted by a saucy gendarme, who demanded my business and my passport in the most saucy tone imaginable. I delivered up the passport, and while the rascal went to shew it to the man in office—governor, sub-governor, or some creature of that sort—I had to stand in the dismal passage, among a score or two of soldiers. In general, however, French soldiers are remarkably polite, and these, with the exception of the above individual, were so also. Even he, when he returned, had changed his tone; for, having learned from his superior that I was an Englishman, he came, with cap in hand, to conduct me round the building.

'The first apartment after the chapel, which is small and by no means striking, into which I was led, was the ancient refectory, where there were some hundreds of criminals, condemned for several years to close imprisonment, or the galleys, weaving calico. I never in my life saw so many demoniacal faces together. All the evil passions, nourished by habit, and irritated, not subdued, by punishment, were there, clothed with flesh and blood, and still hungering fiercely after crime. Like Dante and his guide, we made our way through this hell in miniature, a hundred villains scowling at us as we passed, and, crossing several passages and small vaulted chambers, entered a still vaster, called the Hall of the Knights, in which there was a still greater number of ruffians, and apparently of worse character than the others. Here a soldier stood with drawn sword at the door; and the gendarme walked before me, with his hand upon his own weapon, ready to cut down any villain who might set upon us. One countenance which I saw here I think I never shall forget. It was that of a man about forty years of age, small, pale, and haggard, but so expressive of wickedness, that it made me shudder. The ruffian, who was doing something as we came in, just raised himself up to look at us, and, keeping the left eye nearly closed, threw so searching, venomous, malignant, and fiend-like a glance at me with the right, that it almost made me start. Nevertheless the owner of this infernal countenance was a small, withered, weak man, whom one need not have feared to meet alone in a desert; but his look was like that of a scorpion, odious and deadly.

'The apartment in which these miscreants were assembled, was a hall about one hundred feet long by thirty-five or forty in breadth, and was adorned with two rows of massy, antique pillars, resembling those which we find in Gothic churches. From hence we proceeded to the subterranean chapel, where are seen those prodigious columns, upon which the weight of the whole building reposes. The scanty light which glimmers among these enormous shafts, is just sufficient to discover their magnitude to the eye, and to enable one to find his way among them. Having crossed this chapel, we entered the quadrangular court, around which the cloisters, supported by small, graceful pillars, of the most delicate workmanship, extend. Here the monks used to walk in bad weather, contriving the next day's dinner, or imagining excuses for detaining some of the many pretty female pilgrims who resorted, under various pretences, to this celebrated monastery. At present, it afforded shelter to the veterans and gendarmes who keep guard over the prisoners below.

'From various portions of the monastery, we obtain admirable views of the sea and shore; but the most superb coup-d'œil is from a tall slender tower, which shoots up above almost every other portion of the building. Hence are seen the hills and coasts of Brittany, the sea, the sandy plain stretching inland, with the rivers meandering through it, and the long sweep of shore which encompasses the Grève, with Avranches, and its groves and gardens in the back ground. Close at hand, and almost beneath one's feet, as it were, is the barren rock called the Tombelaine, which though somewhat larger than the Mount St Michael, is not inhabited. Even this rock, however, was formerly fortified by the English; and several remains of the old towers are still found among the thorns and briars with which it is at present overrun. Several fanciful derivations of the word Tombelaine are given by antiquaries, some imagining it to have been formed of the words Tumbe Beleni, others, of Tumba Helenæ, and in support of the latter etymology, the following legend is told:—"Helen, daughter of Hoël, King of Brittany, was taken away, by fraud or violence, from her father's court, by a certain Spaniard, who, having conducted her to this island, and compelled her to submit to his desires, seems to have deserted her there. The princess, overwhelmed with misfortune, pined away and died, and was buried by her nurse, who had accompanied her from Brittany." * * * * *

'Having examined the principal objects of curiosity at the mount, and learning that the tide was rising rapidly on the Grève, I descended from the fortress, and, mounting my horse, set out on my return to Avranche. My guide informed me that I had staid somewhat too long; and in fact, the sea flowing and foaming furiously over the vast plain of sand, quickly surrounded the mount, and was at our heels in a twinkling. However, the guide sprang off with that long trot peculiar to fishermen, and was followed with great goodwill by the beast which had been so obstinate in the morning. We were joined in our retreat by a party of sportsmen, who appeared to have been shooting gulls upon the sand; but they could not keep up with the young fisherman, who stepped out like a Newmarket racer, and in a short time landed me safe at the point of Pontorson, near the village of Courtels, where he resided.'—P. 215.

TO THE TATLER.

Mr Tatler,—Permit a stranger in London briefly to give you an account of the impression made upon his mind by French actors. Chancing to be near the Haymarket on Monday night, at the beginning of a heavy shower, to avoid a wetting I entered the Theatre, to see what I never saw before—a French performance. Being but imperfectly conversant with the language, of course much of the dialogue was lost; and but for the admirable acting, the whole would have been an unintelligible series of actions and grimaces, by puppets with the capacity of making noises. Suppose a Frenchman as imperfectly acquainted with the English language as I am with the French, and what to him would appear an English performance, by English actors? Perfectly unmeaning, at least from what I have seen, it so appears to me, even with the advantage of understanding the language spoken. Very different has been the effect upon me of French acting, seen for the first time, and of course under great disadvantages. The first thing which struck me was the sedulous attention paid to minutiæ, upon which so much depends for producing scenic effect—the dresses characteristic—the bye-play natural—just what one would do one's self, without thinking of it—and the actors in the minor parts endeavouring their very best to make them effective, and not taking the pet, because more prominent parts have not been assigned to them, as is the fashion with our English actors, to the destruction of all effect, and the pleasure intended to be produced in the spectator. But the great attraction was the acting of M. Bouffé, in the part of Antoine—so touching, so true to nature—that (shall I confess it?) it brought tears into my eyes, albeit not given to the melting mood—I speak more particularly with reference to the third act—how vividly did he portray the feebleness, the fatuity, the loss of memory, the "sans everything" of extreme old age! I narrowly watched every motion, every gesture, and I could detect not the slightest indication that betrayed he was acting. Was he acting? Yes, assuredly, but true to nature. When he recovers from the effects of endeavouring to bring back to memory the place of the buried treasure—on raising his head, he presented a countenance from which all sense seemed to have fled, it was horribly painful to behold—the thought involuntarily suggested itself, "may old age never be my fate;"—is not the exciting of such feelings the triumph of the actors art? I thought, when a gleam of recollection came upon him, there was somewhat too much of vigour, in both action and voice, to be in perfect keeping with the imbecility assumed, but perhaps it has been seen; and M. Bouffé has studied human nature too deeply to exceed in representing it. But for the vivacity of his eye, which occasionally shot forth, I should have been completely deceived. One other pleasure, and that no mean one, which I derived, was, that unconsciously I might be sitting near some of the heroes of the glorious Three Days. I like to mingle the utile with the dulce, a trick which years ago I learned from yourself, I believe; and having done so, I conclude. Your's, &c.

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

"The little and short sayings of wise and excellent men are of great value, like the dust of gold, or the least sparks of diamonds."—Tillotson.

Lovers of Flowers.—Lord Bacon himself did not disdain to bend his mighty intellect to the subject of their culture. Lord Burleigh found recreation from the cares of state in his flower garden. Ariosto took even an infantine pleasure in his. Cowper and Cowley worked in their own gardens; and with enthusiastic pleasure. Pope had the same taste; and was assisted in his horticultural amusements by Lord Peterborough. Rousseau, who has written some interesting Letters on Botany, of which, among his other accomplishments, he was master, found friends in the flowers, when he thought he had no others: and even his great rival Voltaire, who, if he had more wit, had less sentiment, soothed his irritability and cherished his benevolence in his garden. Sir William Temple desired to have his heart buried in his: and the Emperor Dioclesian preferred his to a throne.—Collected from Miss Kent's Flora Domestica.

Siamese Aristocracy.—Mr Finlayson, in his account of the mission to Siam, complains of the "offensive coarseness," the "manifest disregard to the feelings of others," and the "arrogance unbounded" of the highest ranks in Siam. How grateful we Europeans ought to be that these faults are so peculiar to the Aristocracy of Siam!—Note to the Siamese Twins.

Tragedy and Comedy in One.—Nothing vexed Racine more than the praises of the ignorant; and when he was in a good humour, he would relate the compliment which he received from an old magistrate, who had never been at the play, but who had been persuaded by some friends to attend the representation of the tragedy of Andromache. He was very attentive throughout the evening's performance, which ended with the comedy of Les Plaideurs. On going out he met the author, and said to him, "I have been much pleased with your Andromache; I am only astonished that it should end so merrily: I was near crying at first, but when the little dogs came in, I could not help laughing."

— "One great and common error, amidst a multitude of others, is the confounding the people with the government." (BOROUGHMONGER. Aye, to be sure: they are two distinct things.—REFORMER. Stop a minute: hear the gentleman out.) "The people are supposed to be happy, whensoever the government prospers. Instead of keeping in view the good of individuals, nothing is considered but the growth and duration of empires,—as if the public prosperity and the general felicity were two inseparable matters."—Chatelur on Public Happiness.—(Exit BOROUGHMONGER.)

THE AMERICAN BLACK BEAR.—The pursuit of this animal is a matter of the first importance to some of the Indian tribes, and is never undertaken without much ceremony. A principal warrior gives a general invitation to all the hunters. This is followed by a strict fast of eight days, in which they totally abstain from food; but during which the day is passed in continual song. This is done to invoke the spirits of the woods to direct the hunters to the places where there are abundance of bears. They even cut the flesh in divers parts of their bodies to render the spirits more propitious. They also address themselves to the manes of the beasts slain in the preceding chases, and implore these to direct them in their dreams to an abundance of game. The chief of the hunt now gives a great feast, at which no one dares to appear without first bathing. At this entertainment, contrary to their usual custom, they eat with great moderation. The master of the feast touches nothing, but is employed in relating to the guests ancient tales of feats in former chases; and fresh invocations to the manes of the deceased bears conclude the whole. They then sally forth equipped as if for war, and painted black; and they proceed on their way in a direct line, not allowing rivers, marshes, or any other impediment to stop their course, and driving before them all the beasts they find. When they arrive at the hunting ground, they surround as large a space as they can; and then contract their circle, searching at the same time every hollow tree, and every place capable of being the retreat of a bear; and they continue the same practice till the chase is expired. As soon as a bear is killed, a hunter puts into his mouth a lighted pipe of tobacco, and blowing into it, fills the throat with the smoke, conjuring the spirit of the animal not to resent what they are about to do to its body, or to render their future chases unsuccessful. As the beast makes no reply, they cut out the string of the tongue, and throw it into the fire. If it crackle and shrivel up (which it is almost sure to do) they accept this as a good omen; if not, they consider that the spirit of the beast is not appeased, and that the chase of the next year will be unfortunate.—A Natural History of the Globe, &c. Drawn from the Writings of Buffon, Cuvier, &c.

VIRTUES OF TEA, AND SLEEP.—Many persons who value themselves upon the quantity of wine that they can swallow at a sitting, would probably sneer at the effeminacy of the traveller who should be eloquent in praise of tea; yet those who read Dobell's 'Travels in Kamschatka,' from which the following passages are quoted, will certainly acquit the author of any undue regard to his personal ease, or any disposition to shrink from a traveller's hardships, of which he had an ample share, in traversing the snows of Kamschatka and Siberia. "We travelled on until near eleven o'clock in the day, before we arrived where there was wood enough to boil the tea-kettle. With what pleasure and satisfaction did we swallow a warm and cheering cup of tea! That delicious beverage, far exceeding every other when one is cold and weary! Ardent spirits will warm you more quickly, but their effects are not so lasting, and occasion a drowsy stupor, that makes you afterwards feel quite chilly. I therefore cautiously avoided them on these occasions, or, if I used them, it was a very small quantity mixed with tea. It is the wayworn traveller alone who can feel, by comparison, the full force of Cowper's description of fire-side enjoyments, heightened by

"The cups which cheer, but not inebriate."

In another passage, the author says, "In a short time we were so wet and cold, that we were obliged to stop and make a fire to dry our clothes, refreshing ourselves at the same time with tea. Though it was without sugar, and we had but a small piece of chocolate to bite as we sipped, it proved extremely palatable, and soon warmed us so as to enable us to proceed again."—Many times when the traveller and his party were without any other food than, as he says above, a morsel of chocolate, they travelled in deep snows, recruiting their strength and spirits with tea.—"We became so accustomed to drink our tea without sugar, that in a little time more we should have forgotten the conjunction entirely. It certainly proved to us a most exhilarating beverage, and, even without milk and sugar, had the effect of stimulating our empty stomachs, and making the pangs of hunger infinitely less troublesome than they would have been without it. I am perfectly satisfied it is more wholesome than raw spirits, or even grog, when there is a scarcity of food,—and that it sustains the strength longer." With a sufficiency of tea and sleep, our traveller seems always ready to brave hunger, heat, cold, fatigue, or danger. "A traveller," he says, "can go through great fatigue on little food, but he cannot do without a good portion of sound sleep, whether his fare be plentiful or not. This balm of human woe is absolutely necessary to repair the ravages which anxiety and fatigue make upon the mind and body of a travelling man. I have observed also that it was not when I slept longest, that I felt most refreshed, but when my sleep was sound and undisturbed, though it were of much shorter duration."

SANTIAGO THEATRICALS.—Much has been said about the great influence of the clergy, in South America, amongst all the classes of the people; but, as a proof that they are not held in such very great reverence, I shall make an extract from my common-place book, written on the 29th of June 1818, when the piece before alluded to was represented at Santiago:—The plot is very simple, and I dare say founded on fact. A priest, who is confessor to a lady, falls desperately in love with her, and she returns his passion. The husband knocks at the door while they are in conference; the priest hides himself until she contrives some excuse to send the husband out again; however, as he would soon return, she dresses up the priest in the interim, like the image of a saint, and makes him stand on the table. On the husband's return, he discovers his wife kneeling to the image, and is delighted with her piety. The image, as he thinks it, representing a saint of a very superior order, he also asks a boon of it, upon which the priest tells him to have a procession, and take him to his convent. The man runs out, and returns shortly after with his neighbours, for the purpose of carrying the image in procession: they sing and perform all the rites requisite for the occasion, when the alcalde of the district, attracted by the noice, enters and discovers the imposture. He immediately exposes the priest, who, by way of recompense, gets a sound cudgelling from the mob. Such is the outline of the piece that I actually saw represented after a grand procession-day. I shall now give a specimen of a Spanish farce, which I also witnessed:—A sportsman appears in quest of game, with a lady, supposed to be his wife. They each kill a bird, and very naturally sit down to prepare for a meal; she has the diligence to pluck the birds, and he goes out for a time. A wild Indian appears, who wishes to gain the lady's good graces; he is playing the amiable in as civilised a way as possible, when the husband returns, who immediately shoots the gallant, and——exit the lady. The sportsman not knowing what to do with the body, at length places it in an upright and fantastical position, and goes away. The Dean then enters, and, observing that the Indian does not pay him any respect, gives him a kick which causes the body to fall. The priest thinks he has killed the savage, but he consoles himself by saying that he supposes he is gone to the devil, as he was not a Christian; upon this, the curtain falls, and so ends the precious morceau. At the same theatre, I saw Shakspeare's Othello, "done into Spanish," with nothing resembling the original, but Othello's black face, and the smothering of Desdemona.—Haigh's Sketches of Buenos Ayres, &c. [By an equally faithful translator, the farce may have been "done into Spanish," from the Arabian hunchback.]

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

COVENT-GARDEN.—A Grand Miscellaneous Selection of Music.

COVENT GARDEN.

WE visited this theatre last night on purpose to hear WINTER'S duet, Vaghi colli; which was sung, and very well sung, by Miss BYFELD and Mrs MAPLESON. A greater roundness and delicacy might be desired in the shake of Miss BYFIELD; but she executed her part with good spirit and intelligence, particularly where it was most expressive of pleasure. Mrs MAPLESON has a voice of unusual depth for a lady, but not so as to descend into the masculine. She gave the fine pensive colouring of the second with its true effect: for the very joys of this beautiful composer are among "the pensive pleasures sweet." Vaghi colli is an effusion of delight at revisiting a lovely and tranquil native spot; but the heart is too much affected to be gay: it heaves and is full of endearment: the sense of the experience of sorrow mingles with its joy; we fancy the eyes looking on the landscape, till they overflow with tears.

This charming duet, which would have been encored, and twice encored, if the audience were half as fond of good music as they suppose themselves, is a proof of what we were saying the other day in the article upon WEBER. There is nothing literal in it, nothing descriptive, no affectation of thinking: it is all pure, genuine feeling, as real as what any sensitive person should feel, who was gazing upon scenes of home, and undergoing emotions of which it is common to say we "cannot describe them." The vague sensations following upon words of joy, the vague sensations following upon words of grief, these it is the business of music to put into strains at once new in their melody, and rich in their harmoniousness; and with these it is, (if our taste is at all above the vulgar) that we shall always find ourselves most affected, far beyond the conceits of musical word-catching, and elaborate efforts at illustration, however scientifically got up. ☞

LESSONS IN BOTANY.

NOW that the Spring is approaching, the leaves about to spread, and the buds to blossom; now that the vivifying influence of the season excites the mind and the body to new exertion, and Nature is daily discovering new beauties, far better studied in their original freshness, than in the wisest books, the writer of this advertisement is willing to remind young ladies residing in or near to the metropolis, that no season can be more favorable for the commencement or resumption of the study of plants, and that she continues to give BOTANICAL LESSONS to young ladies, at their own residences, on Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays.

MISS KENT is too much flattered by Mr Loudon's approbation, to deny herself the pleasure of quoting the favorable opinion expressed in the 'Gardener's Magazine' for February last:—"Miss W. D. is recommended to Mrs Withers, who, in botanical and fruit painting, is our 'bean idéal;' and so is Miss Kent as a teacher of botany for ladies."

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

The Correspondence of the Right Honourable Sir John Sinclair, Bart. with Reminiscences of the Most Distinguished Characters who have appeared in Great Britain, and in Foreign Countries, during the last Fifty Years. Illustrated by Fac-similes of Two Hundred Autographs. Two vols. 8vo. Colburn and Bentley.

In the course of our progress through these volumes, we must not forget to pay our just tribute of applause to the agricultural merits of Sir John Sinclair. We cannot do them more honour in a short compass than by repeating what was said of them by their most illustrious admirer. The following is a passage of a letter addressed to Sir John Sinclair, by no less a man than Washington:—

'I know of no pursuit in which more real and important service can be rendered to a country, than by improving its agricultural,—its breed of useful animals,—and other branches of a husbandman's cares;—nor can I conceive any plan more conducive to this end, than the one you have introduced, for bringing to view the actual state of them, in all parts of the kingdom, by which good and bad habits are exhibited in a manner too plain to be misconceived; for the accounts given to the British Board of Agriculture appear, in general, to be drawn up in a masterly manner, so as fully to answer the expectations formed in the excellent plan which produced them; affording, at the same time, a fund of information useful in political economy, and serviceable in all countries.'—P. 281.

This passage is followed by the one we proceed to extract, which becomes doubly striking at the present moment:—

'Commons, tithes, tenantry (of which we feel nothing in this country), are in the list of impediments, I perceive, to perfection in English farming; and taxes are heavy deductions from the profit thereof. Of these we have none, or so light as hardly to be felt. Your system of agriculture, it must be confessed, is in a style superior, and of course much more expensive than ours; but when the balance at the end of the year was struck, by deducting the taxes, poor rates, and incidental charges of every kind, from the produce of the land in the two countries, no doubt can remain in which scale it is to be found.'—P. 281.

We proceed to pick some more of the plumbs out of the fare which Sir John has provided us. Lord Marchmont, the friend of Pope, lived to the age of eighty-six, preserving his strength and faculties to the last. He rode out only five days before he died. Sir John Sinclair, who knew him, wished to ascertain the system he pursued, and received for answer, that his Lordship always lived as other people did, but that he had laid down when young one maxim, to which he rigidly adhered, and to which he attributed much of his good health, namely,—

Now, Reader, what do you think this maxim was. Never to exceed in his eating? Never to lie late in bed? No. Never to neglect exercise? Never to take much physic? Never to be rakish, to be litigious, to be ill-tempered, to give way to passion? No, none of these. It was Never to mix wines.

What luxurious philosophies these lords have! My Lord Marchmont was resolved to be a long-lived, virtuous, venerable man; and therefore he laid it down as an austere maxim, rigidly to be adhered to, never to mix his wines. To get one glass of wine, in his extreme weakness, is what certain human beings, bent double with age, toil, and rheumatism, can seldom hope for; while another certain human being, having nothing to bend him and nothing to do, shall become a glorious example of the beauty of this apostolical maxim,—Never to mix your wines. Lord Marchmont did accordingly for many years generously restrict himself to the use of claret; his physicians having forbidden him to take that wine, on account of its acidity, he resolved, with equal self-denial, to "confine himself to Burgundy;" and accordingly, with a perseverance that cannot be sufficiently commended, "took a bottle of it every day for fifteen years."

The noble lord was a good man, however, and we do not grudge him his "Neat, as imported." All we lament is, that thousands, as good as he, have not an atom either of his pleasure or his leisure. His acquaintance with Pope reminds us of another of the poet's long-living and wine-drinking lords—Lord Bathurst—who also took his bottle every day, and made a point of taking his ride before it. It is he of whom the pleasant anecdote is related, that living to see his son Lord Chancellor, and continuing to be young in constitution while his son was getting old, he would jocosely say, when the latter retired after supper, "Come, now the old gentleman's gone to bed, we'll have another bottle."

Here follows a most astonishing Alderman. The writer of the letter is Sir Brook Watson, M.P. Alderman of London:—

'Dear Sir,—It gives me pleasure to learn, by your letter of the 15th instant, that bettered health allows the natural bias of your mind its full scope of activity, for the benefit of society. The work, of which you have kindly sent me the prospectus, under your orderly arrangements, will, I doubt not, prove highly useful to the world. My own good constitution, guarded by a disposition naturally moderate in all things, has braved all climates, and left me, at the age of seventy, free from bodily complaint. To the faculty I have not paid five shillings a year for the course of my life; hence I have not been under the necessity of studying the important subjects of health and longevity.

'But, from general observation, I am convinced that an immoderate use of food, however simple, produces more diseases than hard drinking; and that over-exercise is as bad as none. I knew a lady, who, from an accident when a child, was wheeled about in a garden chair, in a good air, for eighty-six years, without a day's illness. My own food never exceeds fourteen ounces in twenty-four hours. You will say this is most strange in an alderman;—but I keep to early hours.

'I am, dear Sir, your very faithful,

'Brook Watson.'

The following affords a pleasing additional instance of the numerous points in which Mahometan and Christian religions agree; we mean the theology of their churches and doctors. Sir John Sinclair was intimate with Abou Tauleb, who visited England about thirty years ago. The Bishop of Landaff (Watson) dined with him one day at Sir John's house; and observing him freely take his wine, asked him how he came to do so, and whether wine was not prohibited by the Koran. Upon which the Persian said, "I take it by inference. In the Koran it is said, that we may take whatever is good for our health. I am informed that taking wine, in this country, is good for the health, and therefore I infer, that I may take it consistently with the principles of the Koran."

At page 31 of the Appendix, our author brings "evidence to prove that the celebrated air, called 'Grammachree Molly,' was composed in Scotland." This evidence consists in the testimony of an old Scotchman of ninety-three, who in the year 1819 told Sir John Sinclair that he recollected having heard the air sung by a native of Breadalbane, in the year 1738; and that "he was informed" it originated in the incident we are about to relate. The incident is worth relating. What value there may be in it, as affecting the real origin of the song, remains doubtful.

'During King William's wars on the continent, soon after the revolution, it was usual, at the end of the campaign, for both armies to retire into winter quarters, and numbers, both of the men and the officers, got leave of absence to go home to see their friends. Among others who availed themselves of this privilege was a young Highland officer, whose relations lived in the upper parts of Perthshire. He visited about in that district, and entertained his friends by talking about the battles in which he had fought, and the wonderful events he had witnessed; and he everywhere met with the most cordial reception. He was at last invited to the house of a gentleman who had an only daughter, whose beauty was the universal theme of admiration. He there recorded his martial feats, which made an impression on the young lady; which the gallant soldier soon perceived, and he contrived to settle a plan with her for their eloping together at midnight. They got off unperceived, and having travelled several miles, they at last came to an inn, where they thought they might refresh themselves in safety. The enraged father, however, as soon as he discovered his daughter's flight, assembled his men, and pursued them with such speed and eagerness, that he overtook them soon after they got into the inn. The lover, though he had nobody to support him, yet he was determined not to yield up his mistress, and being well armed, and an excellent swordsman, he resolved to resist any attack made upon him. When the party pursuing entered the inn, his mistress ran for protection behind him; and he was defending himself and her with his sword, which was a very heavy one, and loaded with what is called a steel apple, in preparing to give a deadly stroke, the point of his sword accidentally struck his mistress, then behind him, so violent a blow, that she expired at his feet.

'Upon seeing what had happened he immediately surrendered himself, saying, "That he did not wish to live, his earthly treasure being gone." When in prison, he composed both the air and the words; and the dreadful scene he had just witnessed, and of which he was the sole cause, would naturally call forth, in an ardent mind, the most melancholy effusions of poetry and music. He was executed the next day.

'These events happened a number of years before John Macdonald first heard the air sung in the Isle of Skye, which was in the year 1738. They were said to have taken place in the wars after the Revolution, and this circumstance is alluded to in the well-known line, "Will you go to Flanders, my Molly, O?" '—P. 31, Appendix.

We doubt the songs having originated in the manner here stated, as we do all similar stories, for this reason;—that we do not think it likely a man suffering under so much anguish, should write verses about it and set them to music. The direct pressure of the misery, and such modes of expressing it, appear to us incompatible. Poems occasioned by grief (supposing it to be very great) are more likely to be written after such a lapse of time as allows the imagination to indulge itself; or at least, to endeavour to make a compromise between lingering sorrow and a graceful pursuit. If composed under existing circumstances of calamity, it is probable that the circumstances are not hopeless. In a situation like the one above described, it is difficult to conceive how the writer could bear to throw his words into an artificial arrangement, or (if he attempted to sing what he composed) to hear the sound of his own voice. On the other hand, extremes meet; and it is impossible to say how far the prospect of joining his mistress in death, might not have put something of a pleasure into his tears, almost as if she had been alive.

PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS.

[Second Notice].

The overture to the Midsummer Night's Dream, by Mr Mendelssohn Bartholdy, succeeded the performance of 'The Last Judgment,' and concluded the first act. Mr Bartholdy, who is nephew to the eminent Jew philosopher and philanthropist, Mendelssohn, is a young musician of unquestionable talent, and of higher than ordinary cultivation: judging however by those of his compositions that have been performed in public, we think he rather aims at eccentricity than sound and rational melody. The overture in question, for instance, exhibits much that is fantastical, without being pleasing; there are here and there some sweet passages of melody, but the general composition is deficient in design. The vagaries and tiny flutterings of the Elfin people are imitated, but we do not feel that they are imitated successfully—certainly not elegantly. The general style of the piece is a mixture of Beethoven and Weber, with little of the prevailing pathos of the former, and much of the wildness of both.

The Chevalier Neukomm is a musician of a very different character; the two specimens of his talent that he has introduced to this country—the oratorio of 'The Ten Commandments,' and the symphony which was first performed in public on Monday evening, are works that would have delighted the illustrious Haydn and his brother Michael; to both of whom we understand he was pupil. The latter composition is remarkable for its rational as well as beautiful construction; his melodies are graceful and flowing; his harmonies are full and scientific, and his modulations are perfectly easy and unconstrained. The symphony is in the key of three flats, and in the adagio (which is a charming movement) it modulates into the lovely and rich key of A four flats. By the way, we do not remember hearing a composition in this key that was unworthy of commendation; and the cause of this circumstance probably arises from the difficulty of writing in it: none therefore but practised musicians can avail themselves of its combinations and unhackneyed harmonies. The minuet and trio reminded us of the school in which the composer had studied; not from their being servile imitations, but that their character was similar. The whole work, indeed, gives evident proof of being written by a judicious mind, capable of forming a design, of retention, and of working the features with effect.

Mr Willman played an air with variations by Beer, in the most perfect style of expression, tone, and execution. The composition itself, particularly the opening subject, was exceedingly melodious, and it lost not an iota in the performer's hands. We know no better lesson for a singer than to listen to the playing of Mr Willman, particularly in slow cantabile movements. His graces are simple and appropriate, and his expression is totally free from affectation.

Mrs Knyvett made a judicious choice of Mozart's 'Dove Sono' to sing. The character of the air is suited to her style, which is sweet, pure, correct, but unimpassioned. The trio, 'Cosa Sento' however, from the same opera of Figaro, performed by her, Messrs Vaughan and E. Taylor, was flat in the extreme, owing to the total absence of energy in the singers.

Weber's overture to 'Der Beherrscher der Geister' concluded the performance: an effective composition, if noise be the only requisite to produce effect.

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

"The little and short sayings of wise and excellent men are of great value, like the dust of gold, or the least sparks of diamonds."—Tillotson.

Mouth and Eyes.—The mind appears to me to discover itself most in the mouth and eyes; with this difference, that the mouth seems the more expressive of the temper, and the eye of the understanding.—Shenstone.

Origin of the word Valet.—Varlet, valleton, squire, and damoiseau, are frequently used synonimously [in the 13th century] although the last title belongs more particularly to the following century. They were not merely servants, in the modern acceptation of the word, being also aspirants to the profession of knight or man-at-arms. The valet, therefore, degenerate as he is, may be proud of his ancestral dignity. In a house account of Philip le Bel [end of the 13th century] the three children of the king are called Varlets (La Roque de la Nobl.); and in Villehardouin, the son of the Emperor of the East is termed Varlet of Constantinople.—Leitch Ritchie's Romance of History.

A Playhouse is a school of humanity, where all eyes are fixed on the same game or solemn scene, where all smiles or tears are spread from face to face, and where a thousand hearts beat in unison.—Hazlitt.

Curious Ceremonies. — In the evening the Governor (of Yakutsk) waited on me, and invited me to accompany him to a house, to see a ceremony performed, previously to a wedding that was to take place the next day. We repaired to the house, where we found a large party of gentlemen and ladies assembled. The bride and her attendants occupied one end of the room near a large table, on which were placed fruits, cakes, wines, &c. Tea and coffee were then served. Afterwards I was called to look at a procession from an opposite building or store, called in this country an anbar, where every sort of provisions, effects, &c. are kept. I saw several low four-wheeled vehicles, each drawn by a single ox, loaded with furniture, bedding, clothing, &c. &c. for the new-married couple. Lights were carried before them, and a number of young girls, assembled near the door of the anbar, sang in concert, as each vehicle was loaded with the effects of the bride. This ended, the party returned to the house, when dancing commenced, and was kept up with spirit the whole night. Before quitting the house, the parents of the young bridegroom requested me to come the following morning, and witness the ceremony of his taking leave of them, previously to his going to church. At 12 o'clock, on the 22d, we attended at his father's house, where a number of the friends of the bridegroom were collected: several large tables were laid for dinner, and at the principal one, near the images, which in a Russian house are always at the eastern corner of the room, sat the bridegroom and his attendants. A female relative, representing the bride, was placed in the chair on the left hand of the bridegroom; and the father and mother sat at the opposite side of the table. Three dishes of cold meat were placed before the principal attendant, and wine and watky being at the same time handed round, he cut a large cross on the first one, placing it aside; then the second, then the third, in the same way: and at the cutting of each, wine and watky were handed round to the company, who rose, and drank to the wedding party. Nothing was eaten, this being merely a ceremony to prepare the feast for the young couple when they should return from church. After this the bridegroom went round to the opposite side of the table, holding the image of the Virgin in his hand, and crossed himself on his knees, and bowed his head three times to the ground, before his father, who, when he rose, took the image from him, kissed him, and crossed him with it on his head. The same homage was paid to his mother, on which she delivered the image to another person, who preceded the bridegroom and his party to the church, where they met the bride and her attendants; and the couple were then led to the altar, and united in the holy bands of wedlock, by the Protopope, or Chief of the Clergy. The ceremony resembles the Catholic Church, except that, towards the close, the priest places a hymeneal crown on the heads of the man and woman, and they walk three times round a table, where lie the cross and the bible. This part of the proceeding is regarded as binding them in strict allegiance to each other during the rest of their lives. There are also two rings used, which are exchanged, between the man and the woman, during the ceremony. The whole party now returned to the house of the bridegroom's father, where a repast was prepared for them, resembling all large entertainments of this sort. The healths of the principal persons of the place were drunk, and followed by a salute of three guns after each toast. The evening was crowned with an illumination, and a ball, at which, as a stranger, I had the honor of leading off the bride.—Dobell's Travels in Kamschatka and Siberia.

— Boiardi was an indefatigable compiler, estimable in his character, but possessed of a memory very formidable to those who undertook to listen to or to read him. He had cultivated literature in all its branches, and carried in his head an enormous but chaotic mass of knowledge. While the engravings were being prepared for his general catalogue of the monuments preserved at Portici, he obtained the King's permission to place at the head of it a preface, of which he published the commencement, in seven quarto volumes, without having exhausted his subject. For the benefit of those who may be disposed to imitate him, I will explain his method. In speaking of the monuments, it is proper to mention their proportion, but what measures shall he employ?—Then he gives a long account of the measures of the Assyrians, Babylonians, Persians, Greeks, and Romans. The monuments were chiefly taken from the ruins of Herculaneum; this name, the same as Heraclea, was given to several cities; it is necessary then to speak of all these cities;—hence an incursion into the fields of Ancient Geography. Herculaneum was founded by Hercules;—but several heroes are known by that name, the Tyrian, the Egyptian, the Greek, &c. It is necessary to follow these heroes in their various expeditions, and to determine to which of them our Herculaneum owed its origin:—an incursion into the fields of Mythology. We may see that in this manner the author might well have written a dozen volumes, but unfortunately he was checked in his career. Some time after he came to Rome, where I saw him, I asked him if he had finished his preface; he replied that he had discontinued it for the present, and to refresh himself, was preparing an abridgment of the Universal History, in twelve volumes, duodecimo; which would commence with the solution of a problem of the utmost importance to astronomy and to history: this was to fix the point of the heavens, in which God had placed the sun, at the creation of the world. He had just discovered this point, which he shewed me, on the celestial globe.—Memoires sur la Vie de J. J. Barthelemy, par luiméme.—[In another passage, the Abbé describes this Roman prelate (who boasted of his descent from the Chevalier Bayard) as persisting, in spite of the frequent interruptions of a troublesome cough, in reading aloud some of his voluminous manuscripts. In vain the Abbé reminded him that reading would irritate his lungs; he replied that he would sacrifice everything to the pleasure of affording any amusemeut to the Abbé, and accordingly proceeded to read to him a Latin poem, entitled 'An Anatomical Description of the Brain.']

Uses and Abuses of a Mushroom.—The Karaikee conjurors, when they are called upon to exert their skill, eat of the mushroom called mookhamor (the agaricus muscarius) which immediately throws them into a frenzy, and they literally foam at the mouth whilst uttering their cabalistical words, which are always carefully remembered by the hearers, and explained afterwards by the magician, when his fit is over. [This mushroom has the same intoxicating effect upon the rein-deer. In another part of his work, the author says]—The Kariakees watch them carefully, to prevent their eating the Mookhamor, or fly-killing mushroom; for if a herd once gets the taste of them, they become quite wild, and run off in all directions, wandering far and wide to search for more—so that the keeper either loses a number of them, or, if he follows them assiduously, is sometimes lost himself, when they take to the forests. A Karaikee related to me the story of a keeper whose herd was dispersed in that way, but who, by very great exertions, after four or five days collected them together again. However, he found he had wandered far beyond his usual haunts, and lost his way; so that he remained and roamed about with his herd nearly two years before he had the good fortune to meet with any of the Rein-deer Kariakees.—Dobell's Travels in Kamschatka and Siberia.—[The specific name of this mushroom is explained by a note in Loudon's 'Encyclopædia of Plants,' which tells us, that in the north of Europe the inhabitants infuse it in milk, and set it in the windows to poison the flies. It is further observed, that the Russians, Kamschatdales, and Korians use it for intoxication. "They sometimes eat it dry, and sometimes immerse it in a liquor made with the Epilobium; and when they drink this liquor, they are seized with convulsions in all their limbs, followed by that kind of raving which attends a burning fever. They personify this mushroom, and if they are urged by its effects to suicide or any dreadful crime, they pretend to obey its commands. To fit themselves for premeditated assassination, they recur to the use of the mookhamor." This mushroom is found in some parts of Britain, and, administered with due knowledge, is useful in some medical cases.]

LUDICROUS FANCY IN PRAISE OF THE CHILD'S HORNBOOK.

An aged peasant on his latest bed
Wished for a friend some godly book to read;
The pious grandson thy known handle takes,
And (eyes lift up) this sav'ry lecture makes.
"Great A," he gravely read: th' important sound
The empty walls and hollow roofs rebound:
Th' expiring ancient reared his drooping head,
And thanked his stars that Hodge had learned to read.
"Great B!" the yonker bawls.—"O heavenly breath!
What ghostly comfort in the hour of death!
What hopes I feel!"—"Great C!" pronounced the boy.
The grandsire dies with ecstacy of joy.—Tickell.

— It is to be feared, that wars of which the poor bear the burden, and in which millions of them lose their limbs, their wealth, and their lives, are often entered into for the express purpose of increasing their subjection and oppression, and making them the instruments of it.—Dr Hall on Civilization. [It is to be "feared," good doctor! Who doubts it?]

— Spleen is often little else than obstructed perspiration.—Shenstone.

The Wealth of Siberia.—After telling us that blocks of native gold, of ten to twenty pounds weight, have been found in the gold mines, Mr Dobell says, "Siberia produces a great variety of precious stones. The principal ones are the yellow and white topaz, amethysts, crystals of various sorts, aquamarines of different colours, hyacinths, sapphires, emeralds, a species of the ruby, garnets, &c.; also onyx, jasper, agate, porphyry, and marble, in great abundance. There are also silver mines in Perm. The adamant or loadstone, of strong attractive powers, is common there. Asbestos also is found in such quantities, that gloves are made of it at Ecatherineburg, as curiosities to sell to travellers. When soiled, they are cleaned by putting them into a red hot fire, the most intense heat only serving to whiten, without in any degree consuming, this extraordinary fossil. We may say with truth, there is scarcely a mineral or a fossil in nature that is not found in Siberia!"—Dobell's Travels in Kamschatka and Siberia.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

Covent Garden.

Miss Fanny Kemble repeated last night the part of Constance in King John, which she played for her benefit on Monday. It is not one of her best performances, especially in the eyes of those who recollect her aunt in the character. It wants movement and effect. It wants passion. We do not mean vehemence, of which it has rather too much, but suffering and impulse. Finally, it wants dignity. There is now and then, in this as in other performances of Miss Kemble, a passing shade of family likeness to Mrs Siddons. Her head-dress last night assisted it. But to institute a direct comparison with her is surely unfortunate. The Constance of Mrs Siddons was one of the most natural, passionate, yet dignified of her performances. The passage in which Constance wildly seats herself upon the ground, and exclaims,—

"Here I and sorrow sit: let kings come bow to me,"— produced no effect last night. All who remember Mrs Siddons must remember its electrical effect, and how marvellously she reconciled the mad impulse of it, with habitual dignity. Miss Kemble was almost always stationary in her grief. Mrs Siddons used to pace up and down, as the eddying gust of her impatience drove her, and all her despairing and bitter words came with double force from her in the career. And then what a person she had! and how regal she used to look! hardly more so as Queen Constance, than as Mrs Siddons herself! lofty tones and conscious modulations seemed natural in her mouth, as expressing the beauty of all that was ideal both in her theatrical and personal character. In Miss Kemble (without meaning to imply that she is not otherwise quite as estimable a person in every respect) they always carry with them an air of elaboration and assumption,—we mean assumption in the literal sense,—something taken up for the purpose of the moment, and foreign to her in the abstract. Her best passage last night was the quiet and exhausted manner, the momentary patience into which she fell from her general vehemence, just before she resumed it and tore off her diadem. But the performance upon the whole was flat, and thought to be so. Miss Kemble never does anything without shewing great occasional cleverness: in some characters, as in the Fair Penitent, she does more: but Constance is certainly not one in which any of her powers is elicited to advantage, not even in the sarcasms directed against Austria, which seemed rather the effusions of quiet spite, than of uncontroullable contempt. We doubt whether she will be tempted to repeat the character often.

To mention Mr Charles Kemble's Faulconbridge, is to praise it: for everybody knows how excellent it is. ☞

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

The Correspondence of the Right Honourable Sir John Sinolair, Bart. with Reminiscences of the Most Distinguished Characters who have appeared in Great Britain, and in Foreign Countries, during the last Fifty Years. Illustrated by Fac-similes of Two Hundred Autographs. Two vols. 8vo. Colburn and Bentley.

[Concluded from yesterday.]

We have recurred to this book often, but when the reader considers that it consists of two large octavo volumes; and that we have passed over a good deal of extractable matter, he will not think our little paper unreasonable.

'It has been often remarked,' observes our author, 'that the greatest events are often produced by very insignificant causes. Of this a very striking instance occurred, connected with the late King's first illness, which I shall endeavour briefly to relate.

'It was on the 20th of September 1788, that a notification was made to both houses of Parliament, that his late Majesty (George the Third), was no longer competent to perform the functions of the Royal office; and his incapacity was fully established by the examination of his Majesty's medical attendants, before Committees of both Houses. After considerable delays, in consequence of a claim which had been maintained in both Houses, that the Prince of Wales was entitled to assume the Regency, both Houses at last declared the King's incapacity. Mr Pitt, the minister, then gave notice that he would propose his plan of a Regency to the House of Commons, on the 6th of January next (1789). The particulars having been so often fully debated in both Houses, it was not supposed that the bill would occasion much discussion. It was calculated that it would pass in less than a fortnight (the bill, indeed, afterwards remained only six days in the House of Commons); and that, in a very short time, the King's authority would be abrogated.

'About this time, in conjunction with Lord Moira, I had formed a political party of respectable members of both Houses, with a view of promoting some public objects which we had in contemplation. Among those who joined us was Mr Loveden, member for Abingdon in Berkshire, who was considered a highly respectable country gentleman, and who, having occasionally stated his sentiments to the House in a manly and spirited manner, had come to be regarded as a kind of leader among his own class.

'This party happened to dine together on the 5th of January, the day before Mr Pitt's intended motion; and Mr Loveden, who had arrived in London only that morning, attended at dinner, and by accident sat at table next to me. We of course discussed the great subject which then engrossed all public attention, when he told me "That his friends in Berkshire were greatly dissatisfied with the proceedings in Parliament, and wished much for another examination of the physicians regarding the state of the King's health." He added, "that if I would second the motion, he would move, next day, for another examination."

'The least difficulty on my part would have prevented the motion; but as the nation had not suffered from the delays that had already taken place, it appeared to me that no detriment was likely to arise from a short additional delay. I therefore encouraged him to make the motion, and agreed to second it.

'When Mr Pitt therefore rose on the day after, to propose his plan of a Regency, Mr Loveden moved that the physicians should be examined, on the ground "that the intended limitations would necessarily have a reference to the state of his Majesty's health, and that several weeks had elapsed since that had been ascertained, which rendered a new examination necessary before proceeding any further in so momentous a question." After much discussion, a new committee was actually appointed. Their report was made on the 13th of January, and on the 16th it was appointed to be taken into consideration. A delay of eleven days in the progress of the business was thus obtained; and though Mr Pitt explained to the House his plan on the 15th of January, it was not till the 6th of February that the Regency Bill was brought in. On the 12th of February, however, it was carried to the House of Lords, and read a second time without opposition. But before the bill had made any further progress, the necessity of appointing a Regency was put an end to by the King's recovery. There is every reason, however, to believe, that had it not been for the eleven days occasioned by Mr Loveden's motion, the Regency Bill would have passed. The delay was of more importance than is generally known, the King having afterwards declared, that if he had been found incapable of exercising the Royal functions, by a solemn Act of the Legislature, no earthly consideration would ever have induced him to resume them, from a dread that his complaints might return, which the labour and vexation attending public business was likely to promote. The power of Mr Fox and his party would then have been permanently established; and all these momentous events, which depended so much on Mr Pitt's continuing in power, would have taken a quite different turn.'—P. 355.

Sir John's second volume is occupied chiefly with sketches of his travels, and notices of the persons they brought him acquainted with. During his first excursion from England, which was to France, he was much delighted with the 'gaiety and good humour, which seemed everywhere to characterize the peasantry. One trait,' says he, 'occurred at a village in Burgundy, which I still recollect with pleasure. Observing some grotesque figures near the door of the inn where we were changing horses, my brother burst into an immoderate fit of laughter, in which I could not refrain from joining, a bystander, instead of being angry at the merriment we enjoyed at the expense of his countrymen, exclaimed, with much good humour—"Jaimece joli musique."'

Specimen of a day spent in Paris, compared to one in London.—'During my stay in Paris at this time, my great object was, to breakfast with the learned,—to dine with great political characters,—and to sup with the gay,—of which style of living, I find in my notes the following instance.

'Soon after my arrival, I was invited to breakfast with the Count de Catuelan, to meet the celebrated Monsieur le Roi, and other academicians. M. de Catuelan was a native of Brittany. He had one of the finest libraries in Paris, which particularly abounded in English books. His brother was first president of the Parliament in Brittany, and derived great credit, from the spirit with which he supported the privileges of that respectable body against the merchants of the Crown. The conversation was scientific and attractive, and it gave me a very high idea of the literati of France.

'On the same day I was asked to dine with the celebrated Necker. His appearance was heavy, and there was no spirit of vigour in his eye. He was very reserved, as might be expected, from an ex-minister in a very delicate situation. When I pressed him to come to England, he said he never expected to re-visit that country. It is unfortunate that the marriage between Mademoiselle Necker and Lord Rivers' son, did not take place, as it would have detached him from French politics. When the dinner party at Monsieur Necker's separated, I went to the Convent de Belle-Chesse, to wait on the celebrated Madame de Genlis. I found her remarkably clever, but no beauty at that time, whatever she might have formerly been.

'I then went to sup at Monsieur Mirbeck's, who gave a fête to a select party of twenty of the gayest people in Paris. There was music, but no cards. I observed that the instruments, both there and at Monsieur Necker's, were English. The conversation was sprightly and well calculated for the lively company who were assembled on that occasion.

'It may be interesting to contrast the events of that day with one spent in London, which I had dedicated to the amusement of a Spanish gentleman, whom I had met with abroad.

'I took him first to breakfast with Sir Joseph Banks, in Soho Square, where he met with a number of distinguished literary characters.

'We thence proceeded to the celebrated dock-yard of Mr Perry, on the banks of the Thames, where he witnessed a launch of the largest Indiaman that had ever been built. He was astonished, not only with the sight, which was quite new to him, but with the elegant and numerous company assembled to see it, and the excellent entertainment which was given upon the occasion.

'I then took him to a dinner given at the Freemasons' Tavern, by the Highland Society of London. The Duke of Sussex presided with his usual ability and success. Nothing astonished the Spaniard more, than to be thus in a manner at once transported into a foreign country, where the dress, the language, the instruments of music, the music itself, and the whole scene, was different from anything he had ever before witnessed, exhibiting the manners and customs of a century or two preceding.

'I concluded with taking him to hear the celebrated Billington sing; and on the whole he said he had never before been a partaker of such a variety of entertainments, and of so gratifying a nature, on the same day.'—Vol. II. p. 88.

DENMARK.—'The manners of the Danes are modelled more after the English than the French fashion. They have clubs, in imitation of those in London, where nothing but the English language is spoken. This has given rise to some odd mistakes. One gentleman, in particular, thought that ch was always pronounced k, and ordered a good kicking, instead of chicken, for his dinner.'—P. 204.

SELF-SUFFICIENCY IN FULL FLOWER.—Prince Kaunitz was born in 1712, and, when I saw him, in 1786, was about seventy-four. For that age he was remarkably healthy. He rode every day, either in the open air, or, when the weather was unfavourable, in a menage couvert, and eat most voraciously. He is the proudest, and, at the same time, the vainest of all mortals; and it is hardly possible to conceive the existence of such a character, in a civilized European country, for it seemed much more analogous to that of a despot, trained up with all the blandishments of an eastern seraglio, than to the freedom of European society. But flattery, on weak minds, has everywhere the same effects. He is so inflated with pride, that he thinks he has no equal, and perhaps, that such a human being hardly ever before existed. He is convinced that he is the only man in Europe who knows the real interest of each sovereign in it, and is inflated with other ideas equally ridiculous. He thought himself so much wiser than his predecessors in the councils of Vienna, that he would chalk out a new system. He abandoned, therefore, the English alliance, and resolved to unite the two rival houses of Austria and Bourbon, by marrying an Austrian Archduchess to the future sovereign of France. The mischievous consequences resulting from that alliance are well known.

'Having, as he supposes, no equal, he thinks it beneath him to entertain either friendship or enmity. He considers himself the only good horseman and architect in the universe. "When I die," says he, "equitation will be lost," and he maintained, that all former architects were ignorant men, who knew nothing of the matter. Had he time, he affirmed, he would undertake to draw up the plan of a theatre, with this advantage, that the side boxes were to have a front view of the stage.

'His mode of living is as follows: His niece, a good-humoured widow, resides with him, and superintends his household. He has every day a table of eighteen or twenty covers. His courier goes about a day or two before, and by a verbal message invites the company. He dines at six, and, as the opera begins about seven, on these nights, he finds it difficult to get a sufficient supply of good company, and young strangers are generally taken in to dine with him. He certainly gives very good victuals; but seldom more than two bottles of wine to eighteen or twenty people. It was once remarked as a wonder, that an Englishman had drank four glasses during dinner. After he has dined, he sits for a quarter of an hour, picking and cleaning his teeth. There never was a more disgusting toilet. He then returns to the drawing-room, where he spends the evening, and where all the principal people of Vienna come and go just as they please.

'He sometimes plays at billiards there, but always with a servant, as if it was beneath him to place any person of rank on a footing with him.

'I saw the Archduke and Archduchess paying him great court, and with much humility. The Emperor also comes occasionally, and there is an arch from the ramparts to Kaunitz's house, which he crosses, when he chooses to come privately. His influence at court, however, is very much dimished since the accession of the Emperor, which chagrins him not a little.

'He treated the Pope, the Grand Duke of Russia, and the Duke of York, with the greatest hauteur; was indignant that the Pope should ask him if he knew Italian. "Je le connais au fond," he answered; and was very angry with the old Galliard, as he called him, for supposing that Prince Kaunitz was ignorant of anything.

'He is very fond of horses, and if he likes a horse, will ask for it without ceremony. Lady Craven sent him one she had received from a Turkish Bashaw; but, after trying the horse, he sent it back very ungallantly, saying, it did not suit him.

'He has a remarkably fine set of teeth for his time of life, in consequence of the great care he has paid to their preservation. From the regular exercise he takes, and attention to his health, he is likely to live long. But it was generally remarked that his understanding (never a strong one) had begun to be impaired.

'On the whole, I do not recollect, either in my own extensive experience, or in any history, either ancient or modern, to have seen or heard of such an example of weakness, pride, and self-sufficiency.'—P. 309.

BUONAPATE AND THE ABBE SIEYES.—'When the formation of a consulate was determined upon, it became a doubtful question, whether he or Buonaparte should be appointed First Consul. Sieyes's plan was, to be nominated to that situation, and to employ Buonaparte, as Second Consul, to carry his orders into execution. The superior cunning, ability, and promptitude of the Corsican, in one instant, baffled all the schemes which he had been so long meditating, and which he thought were on the eve of being happily accomplished.

'The place where they assembled to elect the Consuls was the Gallery of the Luxemburgh, a very large hall, where the electors formed themselves into parties, with their leaders, and though within sight, yet each of them at such a distance from the other as not to be heard. Sieyes lost no time in addressing his party, and descanted upon the advantages of having a person well acquainted with political questions and civil affairs at the head of the new government; and the danger of having a soldier entrusted with supreme power, who might, in the end, establish military despotism in a country which had conquered its liberties (the event has proved that this observation was perfectly well founded); and without pointing himself out to be the man, he plainly indicated the line he wished them to pursue. As soon as he had made this declaration, one of Buonaparte's emissaries, who had mixed himself with the Abbé's friends, quitted the place where they had assembled, joined the other party, and informed them of what had passed. Buonaparte instantly said, "I see what must be done,—and all I entreat of you is, as soon as you see me take Sieyes by the hand, that you will cry, Bravo Buonaparte, as loud as you can, and will prevail on as many as possible to join in the exclamation." He immediately went to the place where Sieyes and his party were assembled, and going up to the Abbé, with a great appearance of cordiality, he said, "Let us not, my friend, have any difference of opinion, who shall be the First Consul; for my part, I vote for the Abbé Sieyes—whom do you vote for?" The Abbé, astonished at such an unexpected address, was led, from complaisance, and in affectation of gratitude and friendship, to say, "I vote for the General Buonaparte." On which Buonaparte gave his hand to Sieyes as if to thank him for his vote. This being the signal agreed upon for crying 'Bravo Buonaparte,' it resounded from all quarters; Buonaparte's partizans, having dispersed themselves throughout the hall, and mixed with those of the other candidates. Even some of the friends of the Abbé Sieyes, who saw what had passed, could not help joining in the cry without thinking of the consequences. Buonaparte was instantly declared First Consul. The Abbé was offered to be made Second Consul, but was so much chagrined at his disappointment, that he declared his resolution to take no further concern in public affairs.

'It is impossible to conceive that any man could have been placed in so many critical dilemmas as Buonaparte has been, and to have got through them so successfully, without being possessed of the ability and decision which this anecdote evinces. It was communicated to me by a friend, who had it from one of the very actors in the scene, and its authenticity may be depended upon.'—P. 450.

THEATRICAL CRITICS!

ARE of four orders, viz. the Partial, the Impartial, the Spiteful, and the Asinine. Your partial critic takes his chop with Hopkins the actor, and sometimes borrows a trifle of H. the return of which it is impossible to hint at, as it might beget a cutting coolness on the part of the partial critic; so, while the chops, the trifle, and the intimacy are extant, Hopkins is a charming Thespian, chaste beyond expression, and embodies the conceptions of his author to perfection, is ever announced as acting with his usual "rich humour," or "deep pathos," or "refined taste," or "vivid irradiance of genius." Or your partial critic will carry his love for his friend to extremes, and damn, with energetic determination, all upstarts or rivals in his protegé's peculiar province; he will therefore observe, that "Mr So-and-so played such and such a part, but we have seen Hopkins in the same, and oh! &c." Your impartial critic is of a very rare order; he will not write up a friend in opposition to his own judgment, but will tell him, in good set terms, that he did such a part execrably, or tolerably, as the case may be; should he offend his acquaintance thereby, it doth not influence his principles; he argues that such a friend must not interfere with a critic's regard for truth; and if a fault is to be found, he will show how such fault may be avoided, or how a certain passage might be improved. If the censured actor be sensible, he will not frown at a fair criticism, but strive to profit by the objections of his censor, subject at all times to the degree of talent displayed by the critic. If the latter be of good and true judgment, there will ever be a flashing of genius in his remarks, however brief. Your common-place and stupid critique is the especial trait of the spiteful and the asinine, while the partial are not always free from the defect. Ergo—Your impartial critic is the only man whose opinion is worth a straw. Your spiteful critic is not unfrequently a disappointed author, or actor, or chastised slanderer; he will sit in the house on the first night of a new piece, and if the author be a man he hates, you will perceive his assumed look of contempt; he will knit his brow, draw down the corners of his mouth most superciliously, elevate his nose, and have a sharp ear for a hiss: if he laughs once or so, it is at some blunder made by a performer, or during a scene of interest when the audience are breathless and silent. If the piece be received with applause, he will damn it with faint praise, walk to his desk uneasy and discontent, and descant on the decline of the drama. Should there be a damnation, then listen to his shrewd remarks, the wit he has borrowed to retail for the occasion, and observe the pint of wine he orders: if the question is asked him by a stranger of the success of the new production, he will chuckle and tell him at once. If your spiteful critic dislikes a well known actor, he never condescends to notice his performance, however successful or admired it may be; but should the town be teeming with his praise, and the spiteful critic feels that he must give a notice, he then says "A Mr So-and-so played such-and-such a part: it is unpleasant to record decided failures, but in this instance we must, &c. &c." Your asinine critic is a very droll fellow; he affects intimacy with all authors or actors of eminence, but at the same time endeavours to impress all that he may know with ideas of his vast consequence, and of the great deference paid to his opinions by the public: the utmost encouragement he can give in the theatre is to applaud in gloves, and that by tapping his right forefinger in the palm of his left hand, making "A sound so fine, that nothing lives 'twixt it and silence." Should he possess the privilege of the green room, he is always seen walking behind the manager like a pet puppy: if the former have wife or favorite who may act, he will extol her to the skies, write her biography, and do her much injury. He ever speaks well of established favorites, but will carefully avoid directing attention to rising or persevering talent. After a rhapsody of eulogium in venerable common places, on persons who do not heed or require such distinction, he will think it time to be a little severe, if only to support his character of asinine critic; he will then conclude his remarks by singling out some young actor or actress about to rise in his or her profession, and will be most sapiently cruel in the following manner: "We hear that Mr or Miss Such-a-one is engaged at such a theatre royal—we shall have such-and-such a thing next. Is this to be endured? spirit of Shakspeare forbid!" &c. &c. Children of Thespis heed not such drivellers; they cannot harm thee. Let the sensible and impartial critic be thine only Mentor. If thou canst not laugh at, or pity the partial, the spiteful, or asinine, incessant will be the rising of thy bile, and very savage will be thine intentions.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

DRURY-LANE.—A Grand Miscellaneous Selection of Music.

DRURY LANE.

THE Oratorios and Musical Selections of the season closed last night with an overflowing house. They have been, we believe, more than usually successful; partly perhaps owing to a consideration of the popular taste, more speculative than ambitious, and partly to the attractiveness of the fairer portion of the singers. Miss PATON'S talents have been turned to ample account. And the public have justly risen in their opinion of those of Mrs WAYLETT, who is acknowledged to be one of the prettiest ballad-singers that have appeared a long while. With one exception, indeed, all the female singers have shewn greater ability than was expected of them; and if we mention no names, it is in order not to press upon the owner of that one. The trial she has undergone, sometimes a severe one, will do no harm to any real talent she may possess. Under all the circumstances, we think it calculated to do the reverse; and we shall be glad to be able to say so.

Among the causes of the prosperity of these musical evenings, BRAHAM must not be omitted. He was judiciously made to take the lead, and (after the lapse of an evening or two, when he appeared to us not to exert himself) magnificently he took it. We fancy we hear his voice now, opening upon the house like a trumpet, yet equally able to withdraw into softness and tenderness, and to take pity on the sorrows it uttered. Mr PHILLIPS too has a right to be mentioned separately. He contrived to distinguish himself, even on these unfavourable occasions, as a dramatic singer, and a singer too, of the no mean comic order, effective and full of enjoyment, without losing the graces of gentility.

These musical selections however have been very deficient in variety. We forget what the custom may be in that respect; and we are aware that the more certain pieces are admired, the more natural and proper it is, that they should be repeated, in order that new hearers may enjoy them as well as the old. Furthermore, we are among the last who would object to selections from HANDEL, or HAYDN; and we are as glad to hear the best things of ROSSINI, as he seems to have been while he was writing them. Lastly, a reasonable sprinkling of the music of living composers is not to be objected to, whether known much to fame or otherwise. We like to see fair opportunities given, and friendly occasion taken. Mr BISHOP has written two or three things, equally popular and beautiful, which entitle him, we think, to the rare praise of being a man of genius: and Mr LEE has established himself as a pretty composer of ballads. But why almost the whole vocal music should be German and English, yet not including such men as GLUCK and PURCELL, with but one piece of WINTER'S, and why there should have been hardly a single Italian composition of any value but ROSSINI'S, we are unable to conceive. Was it owing to the preference for super harmonized pieces, which is now the fashion? or to the want of animal spirits,—real in the selectors, or supposed in the audience? We think the success of Mrs WAYLETT'S ballads might have shewn, that simple passion in still finer shapes might not have lost its effect. PAESIELLO'S 'Rachelina' and 'Lindoro' might at all events have been secure under their English names of 'Whither my love' and 'For tenderness form'd;' and as to animal spirits, MARTINI'S little laughing trio fairly took the audience by storm. The only two things we ever heard twice encored at an oratorio, were this trio, and MOZART'S duet of 'Giovinette,' out of Don Juan. After which, and the encores which the best ballads are almost sure to meet with, it is surely not too much to expect, that on a future occasion some more of the finest and liveliest specimens of Italian melody should be given us. The common run of the musical world doubtless admire scientific instrumental compositions more than any other, because they remind them of their own studies, and of what in some measure they can do themselves. And for similar reasons, the same compositions will be admired, or listened to as if they were loved and understood by all those among the audience who know the violin a little, or sing bass a little, or play a little on the piano-forte, or have any other little insights into the mysteries of harmony (not to mention the real amateurs who admire them justly, and can shew us their reasons for it). But still these are not the things that put either the least or the most refined part of the audience into their greatest transports. Some of HANDEL'S simplest sublimities, LUTHER'S Hymn, the ballads, and the laughing trio,—all those compositions, in short, which go the most directly to the feelings whether of refined hearers or not,—these were the pieces which, throughout the season (as far as we can speak from experience) received the greatest applause. The voluptuous pathos of WINTER may be reckoned an exception, because that perhaps demands refinement as well as natural sensibility to admire it; and Mr BRAHAM now and then condescended to make a sensation with a composition more noisy than good: but the spirit of our remark, we think, will be found just by those who call the various evenings to mind; and it is to be hoped, that if just, an attention to them the next time would increase the attractions of this species of entertainment.

CHINESE ABSURDITIES.—When the Hong merchants of China are summoned before the collector of customs, "they present themselves on their knees, knocking their foreheads six, nine, or twelve times against the ground, before they are noticed and permitted to change their posture. And when they rise, they dare not lift their eyes higher than the level of the fifth button on the Mandarin's breast! It is an unpardonable affront, (or only atoned for by some strokes of the bamboo) should they chance to look him in the face. It would appear that the old proverb, "A cat may look at a king," has no parallel in China! Any one called before a judge to give his evidence or otherwise, is always obliged to knock his head at least three times to the ground, and is not suffered to speak, except in answer to the interrogatories which are put to him. Two men with bamboos stand near to punish him who infringes this rule..... When they wish to swear a witness, a live cock and a knife are presented to him, and he is obliged to cut off the cock's head, at the moment of taking the oath. The cutting off the cock's head is considered in the same light as the kissing the bible with us.—Dobell's Travels in China.—[China must keep fast hold of her old system of exclusiveness, if she means the reign of the Bamboo to be of very long continuance, for, if "the schoolmaster" gain admission, it will be speedily deposed.]

LESSONS IN BOTANY.

NOW that the Spring is approaching, the leaves about to spread, and the buds to blossom; now that the vivifying influence of the season excites the mind and the body to new exertion, and Nature is daily discovering new beauties, far better studied in their original freshness than in the wisest books, the writer of this advertisement is willing to remind young ladies residing in or near to the metropolis, that no season can be more favourable for the commencement or resumption of the study of plants, and that she continues to give BOTANICAL LESSONS to young ladies, at their own residences, on Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays.

MISS KENT is too much flattered by Mr Loudon's approbation, to deny herself the pleasure of quoting the favourable opinion expressed in the 'Gardener's Magazine' for February last;—"Miss W. D. is recommended to Mrs Withers, who, in botanical and fruit painting, is our 'beau ideal;' and so is Miss Kent as a teacher of botany for ladies."

The study of Botany is much easier than appears to those who have not attempted it. With a few books and a very little assistance, (or, if our love of flowers be very great, from our books only) we may soon learn to discover the genus of flowers, and, ere long, to distinguish their species. Let any one who is fond of flowers, make the experiment; it may be made at very little expense: any of the English Introductions to Botany, Smith's English Flora, and a botanical microscope will suffice for the commencement. We should add, perhaps, a little tin case, in which to bring home and to preserve the plants, until they can be examined at leisure. Oh, what delight does the young botanist experience, when he first ascertains a plant by his own observation of the natural characters! With what interest is every new flower added to his store of knowledge! and, when more advanced, and the common plants of the neighbourhood have become familiar, how welcome is the sight of a plant that he does not know; what ecstacy if it be a rare one! what consciousness of wealth in the daily increasing herbarium! The herbarium is a thing of course, for every young botanist whose love of flowers is genuine, will be earnest to preserve specimens of the plants he examines; to serve at once as trophies and memorials.

Address to MISS KENT, Mr Hunter's, Bookseller, 72 St Paul's Churchyard; where may be had MISS KENT'S "New Tales for Young Readers."

EMANCIPATION OF THE JEWS.

By William Hazlitt.

"Player. We have reformed that indifferently, my Lord.
Hamlet. Oh! reform it altogether."

The Emancipation of the Jews is but a natural step in the progress of civilization. Laws and institutions are positive things: opinions and sentiments are variable; and it is in conforming the stubbornness and perversity of the former to the freedom and boldness of the latter, that the harmony and beauty of the social order consist. But it is said, "The Jews at present have few grievances to complain of; they are well off, and should be thankful for the indulgence they receive." It is true, we no longer burn them at a stake, or plunder them of their goods: why then continue to insult and fix an idle stigma on them? At Rome, a few years ago, they made the Jews run races (naked) in the Corso on Good Friday. At present, they only oblige them to provide asses to run races on the same day for the amusement of the populace, and to keep up the spirit of the good old custom, though by altering it they confess that the custom was wrong, and that they are ashamed of it. They also shut up the Jews in a particular quarter of the city (called Il Ghetto Judaico) and at the same time will not suffer the English as heretics to be buried within the walls of Rome. An Englishman smiles or is scandalized at both these instances of bigotry; but if he is asked, "Why then do you not yourselves emancipate the Catholics and the Jews?" he may answer, "We have emancipated the one." And why not the other? "Because we are intolerant." This, and this alone, is the reason.

We throw in the teeth of the Jews, that they are prone to certain sordid vices. If they are vicious, it is we who have made them so. Shut out any class of people from the path to fair fame, and you reduce them to grovel in the pursuit of riches and the means to live. A man has long been in dread of insult for no just cause, and you complain that he grows reserved and suspicious. You treat him with obloquy and contempt, and wonder that he does not walk by you with an erect and open brow.

We also object to their trades and modes of life; that is, we shut people up in close confinement, and complain that they do not live in the open air. The Jews barter and sell commodities, instead of raising or manufacturing them. But this is the necessary traditional consequence of their former persecution and pillage by all nations. They could not set up a trade when they were hunted every moment from place to place, and while they could count nothing their own but what they could carry with them. They could not devote themselves to the pursuit of agriculture, when they were not allowed te possess a foot of land. You tear people up by the roots, and trample on them like noxious weeds, and then make an outcry that they do not take root in the soil like wholesome plants. You drive them like a pest from city to city, from kingdom to kingdom, and then call them vagabonds and aliens.

When reason fails, the Christian religion is, as usual, called in aid of persecution. The admission of the Jews, it is said, to any place of trust or emolument in the State ought not to be sanctioned, because they expect the coming of the Messiah, and their restoration, one day or other, to their own country: and Christianity, it is said, is part of the law of the land.

As to their exclusion because they expect the coming of the Messiah, and their restoration, one day or other, to their own country, a few words will be sufficient. Even if it is too much for a people, with this reversion in the promised land, to have a "stake in the country" added to it; and the offer of a seat in the House of Commons is too much for any one who looks forward to a throne in the New Jerusalem; this objection comes with but an ill grace from the followers of him who has declared, "My kingdom is not of this world;" and who on that plea profess to keep all the power and authority in their own hands. Suppose an attempt were made to exclude Christians from serving the office of constable, juryman, or knight of the shire, as expressly contrary to the great principle of their religion, which inculcates an entire contempt for the things of this life, and a constant preparation for a better. Would not this be considered as an irony, and not a very civil one? Yet it is the precise counterpart of this argument. The restoration of the Jews to their own country, however firmly believed in as an article of faith, has been delayed eighteen hundred years, and may be delayed eighteen hundred more. Are they to remain indifferent to the good or evil, to the respectability or odium that may attach to them all this while? The world in general do not look so far; and the Jews have not been accused, more than others, of sacrificing the practical to the speculative. But according to this objection, there can be no amalgamation of interests with a people of such fantastic principles, and abstracted ties; they cannot care how soon a country goes to ruin, which they are always on the point of quitting. Suppose a Jew to have amassed a large fortune in the last war, and to have laid by money in the funds, and built himself a handsome house in the neighbourhood of the metropolis; would he be more likely by his vote in the House of Commons to promote a revolution, so as to cause a general bankruptcy; or to encourage the mob to pull down his house, or root up his favourite walks, because after all, at the end of several centuries, he and the rest of his nation indulge in the prospect of returning to their own country? The most clear-sighted John Bull patriotism hardly reaches beyond ourselves and our heirs.

As to the assertion that Christianity is part of the law of the land, as Popery is a part of the law of the land at Rome, and a good reason for hunting Jews and refusing Christian burial to Protestants, by whom is it made? Not by our Divines. They do not distrust the power of our religion; and they will tell you, that if Christianity, as sanctioning these cruelties or any miserable remnant of them, is part of the law of the land, then the law of the land is no part of Christianity. They do not forget the original character of the Jewish people, and will not say anything against it. We and modern Europe derived from them the whole germ of our civilization, our ideas on the unity of the Deity, on marriage, on morals,

"And pure religion breathing household Laws."

The great founder of the Christian religion was himself born among that people, and if the Jewish nation are still to be branded with his death, it might be asked, on what principle of justice ought we to punish men for crimes committed by their co-religionists near two thousand years ago? That the Jews, as a people, persist in their blindness and obstinacy, is to be lamented; but it is at least, under the circumstances, a proof of their sincerity; and as adherents to a losing cause, they are entitled to respect and not contempt. Is it the language of Lawyers? They are too intelligent, and, in the present times, not favourers of hypocrisy. They know that this law is not on our statute book, and if it were, that it would be law as long as it remained there and no longer: they know that the supposition originated in the unadvised dictum of a Judge, and, if it had been uttered by a Puritan Divine, it would have been quoted at this day as a specimen of puritanical nonsense and bigotry. Religion cannot take on itself the character of law, without ceasing to be religion; nor can law recognize the obligations of religion for its principles, nor become the pretended guardian and protector of the faith, without degenerating into inquisitorial tyranny.

The proposal to admit Jews to a seat in Parliament in this country is treated as an irony or a burlesque on the Catholic question. At the same time, it is said to be very proper and rational in France and America, Denmark and the Netherlands; because there, though they are nominallly admitted, court influence excludes them in the one, and popular opinion in the other, so that the law is of no avail; that is, in other words, in England as there is neither court-influence nor popular prejudice, and as everything in this country is done by money alone, the Stock Exchange would soon buy up the House of Commons; and if a single Jew were admitted, the whole would shortly be a perfect Sanhedrim. This is a pleasant account of the spirit of English patriotism, and the texture of the House of Commons. All the wealth of the Jews cannot buy them a single seat there; but if a certain formal restriction were taken off, Jewish gold would buy up the fee simple of the consciences, prejudices and interests of the country, and turn the kingdom topsy-turvy. Thus the bedrid imagination of prejudice sees some dreadful catastrophe in every improvement, and no longer feeling the ground of custom under its feet, fancies itself on an abyss of ruin and lawless change. How truly has it been said of prejudice, "that it has the singular ability of accommodating itself to all the possible varieties of the human mind. Some passions and vices are but thinly scattered among mankind, and find only here and there a fitness of reception. But prejudice, like the spider, makes everywhere its home. It has neither taste nor choice of place, and all that it requires is room. There is scarcely a situation, except fire and water, in which a spider will not live. So let the mind be as naked as the walls of an empty and forsaken tenement, gloomy as a dungeon, or ornamented with the richest abilities of thinking; let it be hot, cold, dark or light, lonely or inhabited, still prejudice, if undisturbed, will fill it with cobwebs, and live like the spider, where there seems nothing to live on. If the one prepares her food by poisoning it to her palate and her use, the other does the same; and as several of our passions are strongly characterised by the animal world, prejudice may be denominated the spider of the mind."

Three hundred years ago all this was natural and in order, because it accorded with the prejudices of the time: now it is absurd and Gothic, because it is contrary to men's reason and feelings. Hatred is the food and growth of ignorance. While we know nothing but ourselves and our own notions, we can conceive of nothing else as possible; and every deviation from our practice or opinions gives a shock to our faith that nothing can expiate but blows. Those who differ from us in the smallest particular are considered as of a different species, and we treat them accordingly. But this barrier of prejudice, which is founded on ignorance, is thrown down by the diffusion of light and knowledge; nor can any thing build it up again. In the good old times, a Jew was regarded by the vulgar and their betters as a sort of monster, a lusus naturæ, whose existence they could not account for, and would not tolerate. The only way to get rid of the obnoxious opinion was to destroy the man. Besides, in those dark ages, they wanted some object of natural antipathy, as in country places they get a strange dog or an ideot to hunt down and be the bugbear of the village. But it is the test of reason and refinement to be able to subsist without bugbears. While itwas supposed that "the Jews eat little children," it was proper to take precautions against them. But why keep up ill names and the ill odour of a prejudice, when the prejudice has ceased to exist? It has long ceased amongst the reflecting part of the community; and, although the oldest prejudices are, it is to be lamented, preserved longest in the highest places, and governments to have been slow to learn good manners, we cannot but be conscious that these days are passing away. We begin to see, if we do not fully see, that we have no superiority to boast of but reason and philosophy, and that it is well to get rid of vulgar prejudices and nominal distinctions as fast as possible.

LAFAYETTE.

(A Letter to THE TATLER, from a Friend.)

[We have great pleasure in being able to lay before the reader an instance of the extreme attention and courtesy, with which this great man "delighteth to honour" those who are worthy of his esteem.]

MY DEAR SIR,—As perhaps you may be pleased to hear of the highly courteous reception which I met with from that truly great man, Lafayette, on my late visit to Paris, the following are the details:—

Animated with the enthusiasm which seized every lover of truth and liberty on hearing the glorious event which occurred in Paris last July (so much so, as to be deprived of my right sleep for ten nights together, until I was satisfied of its success) I was naturally anxious to revisit the great nation among whom it had taken place. I longed to see them all again: I longed to pay my respects to that consistent man, who had naturally found himself once more at their head; and I felt as if it would do my very health good, physically as well as otherwise, to breathe that air of Liberty which was now brightening all eyes and hearts, without any of its former clouds. Having been promised an introduction to the General by a friend, I left London for Paris. Immediately on my arrival, my friend, a Member of the Institute, wrote to Lafayette on my behalf, requesting an interview. The following day an answer was returned, and in compliment was written in English. It was headed, "Gardes Nationales du Royaume."

"Paris, le 5me Novembre, 1830.

"I have the honour to present my compliments to ——— and will be very happy to receive him on Monday morning between nine and eleven, and at our soirées of every Tuesday.

"LAFAYETTE."

As a perfect stranger to him, though highly recommended, I of course could expect no more than a cordial reception, such as would be given to every individual. But a book had been put into his hands, written by me thirteen years ago on Italy, in which the principles of the French revolution were developed, and containing prognostications of the event. Here then, by sentiment and feeling, long ago expressed, I happened to have secured myself the lucky chance of being brought into closer contact with this noble philanthropist, than I could otherwise have hoped for; and this will account for the grace and courtesy of my reception.

On Monday morning I attended at his hotel, and was shown into an anti-room, where I found assembled a number of persons, many of whom were foreigners, dressed in splendid uniforms, with officers of the National Guards and other official persons, and friends, waiting to be introduced in succession. Our cards were taken by the Chamberlain and kept in the order given. I had been conversing about half an hour with the Brazilian Consul, during which time a number of gentlemen had been introduced, and after their audience had retired; but although the door opened so often, Lafayette was never seen. About this time his aide-de-camp came out of the audience-chamber, and looking over the cards in the Chamberlain's hand, selected one from underneath, and placed it on the top, as the next to be presented. This, I could very well perceive, was mine; and accordingly my name was the next announced. On my entrance, I saw before me a comely-looking man, apparently about sixty years of age, and with a countenance full of mildness and benignity. He instantly advanced, and taking my hand in both his, expressed, in fluent English, and in the most gratifying terms, his pleasure at seeing me. Being no great proficient in the French language, and at all events unable to express myself in it with that warmth of feeling which my heart was yearning to shew him, I was delighted at his giving me this opportunity of venting myself in "household words".

In the course of our conversation, I told him that the object of my visiting France was principally to see him, and generally to contemplate the effects of the late glorious event; and that I was on the point of immediate departure for London. He very cordially pressed me to stay, saying how happy he should be to introduce me to his family, who, he politely added, would be delighted to see me. He requested me, at all events, to remain while the others were introduced; but, with many thanks, I declined, considering it contrary to etiquette. On my bidding him farewell, still keeping hold of my hand, he accompanied me to the door, which being opened, we entered hand in hand into the anti-room; and before all the company assembled there, he again expressed his regret that I was going so soon, repeating his wish to introduce me to his family, and concluding with an invitation to visit him again, when I returned to Paris. The circumstance of his accompanying me to the anti-room I consider an additional courtesy, inasmuch as I had not seen him do so to any other person, who happened to be introduced while I was there.

I feel at this moment the thrill that ran through me from the warm pressure of his hand; and this interview will ever be one of the most exalting of my recollections.

INTERVIEW BETWEEN THE PRINCE DE LIGNE AND VOLTAIRE.

(From the Journal of a Nobleman, just published.)

THE best thing I could do at Monsieur de Voltaire's was to make no display of wit. I spoke merely to make him speak. I remained eight days in his house, and I wish I had retained in my memory all the sublime, simple, gay, and amiable things which incessantly flowed from his lips: but, in truth, it was impossible. I laughed or admired, and I was in a state of constant enchantment. Even his faults, his errors, his prejudices, his want of taste for the fine arts, his caprices, his pretensions, all was charming, new, piquant, and unforeseen. He so wished to pass for a profound statesman, or for a man of deep learning, that he cared little whether he would be tiresome as such. At that time he was partial to the English constitution. I remember saying to him, "M. de Voltaire, you may as well say that its support is the ocean, without which it could not last."—"The ocean!" he exclaimed; "you have started a thought which induces a good deal of reflection." A visitor from Geneva was announced. "Quick, quick," he said, "du Tronchin;" that is, he was to pass as being indisposed, and the Genevan went away without seeing him. "What do you think of Geneva?" he said to me one day. I knew that at that moment he detested that city. I answered that it was a horrid place; though I thought differently. Another time he said, "As you were lately at Venice, did you see there the procurator Pococurante?"—"No," I answered, "I do not remember him."—"What! have you not read Candide?" he exclaimed in a passion; for there was a time when he had a special partiality for some one of his works. "I beg pardon, Monsieur de Voltaire," I said, "when yon asked me I was thinking of the astonishment I had been thrown into on hearing Tasso's Jerusalem sung by the Venetian gondoliers."—"How was that?" he said; "pray explain it to me."—"They exercise their voices and their memories on the canal grande during the fine summer evenings in that way. The one begins in the recitative style, the other takes up, and so they go on alternately. I do not believe the hackney-coachmen of Paris know the Henriade equally well by heart; and if they did, they would make a sorry business of any attempt to sing its beautiful verses with their rough voices, their vulgar and hard accent, and their throats stimulated by brandy."—"Sir, they are barbarians!" observed Voltaire with petulance: "they are enemies to harmony, and miserable cut-throats! That is the character of the people. And as to your men of wit, they have so much of it, that they thrust it even into the titles of their works. Un livre de l'Esprit! c'est de l'esprit follet que celui-là. L'Esprit des lois: c'est de l'esprit sur les lois. I have not the honour of understanding that book. But I understand the Lettres Persannes; that, indeed, is a good book."—"There are some men of letters," I observed, "of whom you think highly."—"It cannot be otherwise," said Voltaire; "for instance—d'Alembert, who, for want of imagination, calls himself a geometrician; and Marmontel, whose poetry, between you and me, is unintelligible. Those men would no doubt say that I am jealous. Let them think what they please about me. People believe that I am a flatterer at court, and too much of a philosopher elsewhere; that at the Academy I am an enemy to philosophers; at Rome an anti-Christian, owing to my having turned to ridicule the abuses of the church; a preceptor of despotism in parliament; a bad Frenchman, for having spoken well of the English; a robber and benefactor to literary publishers; a libertine, on account of a certain Jeanne, whom my enemies represent as worse than she is; curious and complimentary with men of wit; and intolerant because I preach toleration. Did you ever see one of my epigrams or songs? They are made the handles of those who are ill disposed towards me. Those Rousseaus have made me wish them at the devil; and yet my beginning with them both was good. I drank champagne with the one at your father's table, and that of your relative the Duke d'Aremberg, at whose suppers he always fell asleep. I have been on certain coquetish terms with the other; but having once said that he almost made me wish to walk on all-fours, I was sent away from Geneva, where he is detested."

On another occasion he said, "Some persons imagine that criticism is very galling to me. There, look at this, I cannot conceive how the deuce that man (Frederick II), who does not know common orthography, and who drives verses before him as he would a troop of horse, has succeeded in making such good verses as these:

Candide est un petit vaurien
Qui n'a ni pudeur ni cervelle;
Ah! comme on le reconnoit bien
Pour le cadet de La Pucelle!

That man is incapable of gratitude: he has only evinced it for the horse on which he took flight at Molwitz. The beast has had a pension assigned to it; but the chasseur who came and told him that the battle was won, is still a chasseur at the present day."—"You seem to be on bad terms at present with Frederick," I observed, "c'est querelle d'Allemand et d'amant à la fois." This little quibble made him smile.

One day he said to Madame Denys, "Come, my niece, we will give him something of Molière: let us go into the other room, and perform Les Femmes Savantes." He played the part of Trissotin in a shocking manner; but he was highly amused. Mademoiselle Dupuis, kinswoman to Corneille, was a pleasing woman, and frequently diverted my attention from the performance, which he did not like at all.

He never spoke against Christianity, nor against Fenelon. "I do not like persons of bad faith," he used to say, "and who are apt to contradict themselves. It is madness to write formally in favour of or against religions. Take as an instance, that profession de foi du Vicaire Savoyard, by Jean Jacques."

At that time the parliaments were not in favour with him; so that when he happened to meet his donkey near the garden-gate, he said to the beast, "Mr President, I beg you will go in first." His mistakes and blunders were sometimes highly amusing. One day he took his niece's pianoforte tuner for a shoemaker, and after a long quid pro quo, on finding what the man was, he said to him, "I beg pardon, sir; I really was not aware that you were a man of talent, and I was placing you at my feet: allow me to place myself at yours!"

A visitor with a grey hat and grey shoes suddenly made his appearance one morning. Voltaire was hastening to another room. The visitor followed him, saying, "Sir, I am the son of a lady for whom you have made some very pretty verses."—"Oh, I dare say, sir; I have made verses for so many ladies!—good day, sir."—"It was Madame Fontaine Martel."—"Oh, she was very handsome:—Your servant, sir;"—(going into the other room).—"Pray, sir, what model have you taken for the tasteful furniture of this apartment?—your house is really charming."—(Voltaire, coming back),—"It is all my taste, sir: I gave all the drawings."—"Sir, one of the reasons why I have come to Switzerland is to see Mr Haller.—(Voltaire going again to the next room)—Oh, sir, you must have laid out a good deal of money on all this;—what a charming garden!"—(Voltaire, coming back), "As to that, sir, I can assure you it was all my own planning: my gardener is a stupid fellow."—"I dare say, sir.—As I was going to say, Mr Haller is really a great man.—(Voltaire again going)—How long does it take, sir, to build a château like this?"—(Voltaire coming back.)

Without intending it, they both played one of the most amusing scenes I ever witnessed. Voltaire gave me many other still more comical, by his vivacity, his humour, and his contrition; sometimes as a man of letters; at others as a nobleman of the court of Louis XIV; and then again as a man of the world and a highly finished gentleman.

He was extremely good to all around him, and frequently made them laugh. He was in the habit of embellishing everything he saw and everything he heard. I recollect his questioning one day an officer of my regiment, whose answers appeared to him of a very superior order. "What religion do you belong to, sir?" he asked.—"My parents brought me up in the Roman Catholic faith."—"A great answer that! He does not say it is the religion of his own choice." All these things may appear ridiculous, and made him appear ridiculous too; but in his presence it was otherwise. It was admirable to see him, animated by his splendid imagination, distributing and scattering wit and reparties, and making others appear as if they did so likewise; abounding in sense, and animating others with it; referring everything to what he wrote and what he thought; making those who are able speak and think; giving succour to the unfortunate, building for poor families, doing good to his own dependents, and to all the neighbouring villages; a good and a great man at the same time; an union without which it is impossible to be completely the one or the other, for genius gives a greater extent to goodness, and goodness imparts nature to genius.

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

"The little and short sayings of wise and excellent men are of great value, like the dust of gold, or the least sparks of diamonds."—Tillotson.

SOLOMON AND QUEEN SHEBA.—The power of Solomon having spread his wisdom to the utmost parts of the known world, Queen Sheba, attracted by the splendour of his reputation, visited this poetical King at his own court. There, one day, to exercise the sagacity of the monarch, Sheba presented herself at the foot of the throne; in each of her hands she held a wreath, one composed of natural flowers, the other of artificial. The florist, whoever he was, had so exquisitely imitated the real natives of the garden, that at the distance it was held by the Queen, for the King's inspection it was deemed impossible for him to answer the question she put him, which wreath was the production of nature and which of art? The sagacity of Solomon seemed perplexed. The honour of the Monarch's reputation for divine sagacity seemed diminished; and the whole Jewish Court looked solemn and melancholy. At length an expedient presented itself to the King; and, it must be confessed, worthy of the natural Philosopher.—Observing a cluster of bees hovering about a window, he had it opened; the bees rushed into the court, and immediately alighted on one of the wreaths, whilst not a single one fixed on the other. The baffled Sheba had one more reason to be astonished at the wisdom of Solomon.

[We have read of another test to which the Queen put the wise man's discernment. She selected the most effeminate looking boys she could find, and intermingling them in female dresses with the same number of girls, asked him, as he sat at a distance, "which was which." Solomon ordered balls to be put into the hands of the young multitude, and that every individual should throw them at some object, one by one. The different manner in which this action was performed, enabled him to pronounce on the sex.]

THE TABLES WELL TURNED.—If the term romantic implies that which is unnatural, fictitious, or extravagant, then are the men who are generally deemed romantic, the least deserving of the epithet. Those are the romantic, who, blind to the beauties of nature, and regardless of her best gifts, search for happiness in the artificial distinctions of society, or solely in the pursuit of wealth.—Revolt of the Bees.

— Flechier, the celebrated French preacher, was the son of a grocer. It is said, that in a moment of jealousy and ill-humour, a bishop reproached him with the lowness of his birth. "My Lord," answered Flechier, "there is this difference between you and me, that if you had first seen the light in the shop of my father, you would have remained there still."

AS THE TWIG IS BENT, THE TREE'S INCLINED.—The education of young ladies has undergone an infinite number of changes. For a long period, nothing was thought of but teaching them dancing, music, and painting, without paying the smallest attention to the cultivation of their minds. After spending twelve years in teaching them to dress elegantly, to dance gracefully, to sing and to play on musical instruments in the most dashing manner, they were married from motives of ambition, or suitableness of rank and fortune, and were then pushed forward into the world, with this grave advice: "Go, be modest and unaffected; let your inclinations be always solid and moderate; never fascinate any one—it would be a crime; and above all things, be always insensible to the praise you may receive for your personal beauty and accomplishments." One may easily conceive the effect of such advice on a young lady of sixteen, who during the intervals of her occupations, has never been able to think of anything but the happiness and the glory of obtaining distinguished success at a ball or a concert.—Memoirs of Madame de Genlis.

— We are involved so early in the prejudices of so many whose interest is concerned to communicate them to us, that it becomes extremely difficult to distinguish, through the rest of life, what is natural to us, and what is artificial.—St Pierre.

A COMMON WONDER WITH SCHOLARS.—I wonder the ancient mythology never shews Apollo enamoured of Venus; considering the remarkable deference that wit has paid to beauty in all ages.—Shenstone.

STANDING ARMIES.—Philip II (surnamed Augustus) was the first French prince who established a standing army—a mighty engine, in whichever way it acts. In his time it was a successful blow struck at feudality, that terrible hobgoblin which bestrided Europe in her night of ignorance; but afterwards it became still more fatal to the liberties of the people.—Leitch Ritchie's Romance of History.

CURIOUS MODE OF GIVING A BROAD HINT.—The hospitality of the Kamschatdales is excessive, and is carried to an extreme among themselves, that becomes ridiculous. They pay one another visits, which last for a month or six weeks, until the generous host, finding his stock of provisions exhausted, is forced to give a hint to his guest to take his departure. This is managed by presenting to him at dinner, a dish called tolkootha, a kind of olio, or hodge-podge, composed of a number of meats, fish, and vegetables, all mixed together, and very difficult to prepare. It is the dernier resort of the master of the house, and the moment this dish is served up, the guests take the hint, and leave him the following day, without feeling in the least dissatisfied, the proceeding being well understood among them.—Dobell's Travels in Kamschatka and Siberia.

OF THE CHINESE.—Though grapes abound in China, they do not make wine of them. They make cordials from pine-apples, oranges, and other fruits, which though rather strong, are very palatable. * * * * * The principal meal in good society, is about six o'clock in the evening; and, if a ceremonious dinner, it must be made more acceptable to the guests by the accompaniment of a sing-song or play; and the whole entertainment seldom finishes before two or three in the morning. * * * * * A set of the best actors are engaged to perform before the guests, at the cost of from eighty to an hundred and twenty Spanish dollars. * * * * The moment a child is born, it is accounted one year old. * * * * * The Government of China considers the nation as we do our hives of bees, of which we can smother what portion we deem fit, to regale ourselves on the fruits of their industry. * * * * * Neither rich nor poor can dine, breakfast, or sup without soy; it is the sauce for all sorts of food, gives a zest to every dish, and may be said to be indispensable at a Chinese repast.—Dobell's Travels in China.—[Soy is prepared,—not, as many have erroneously supposed, from insects,—but from a plant, called Dolichos Soja, of the same genus as that familiarly termed Cowage, or Cowitch, well known among the mischievous.]

WRECK UPON WRECK.

TO THE TATLER.

MR TATLER,—In your notice of Mr Williams's Morsels of Mirth the other day, you spoke of Mr W.'s pronunciation as "not always Catholic," and his style not "oppressively correct." Now, sir, I am afraid there is a little ill-nature in this: for Mr Williams—I beg to refer you to Sadlers Wells bills—is really a dramatic author. He has—so say those learned documents—written The Wreck: that is, he has taken some of the incidents from the novel, which is the ground-work of The Wreck Ashore, and has then copied verbatim the original part of Magog, given him another name, and finally re-christened himself as "author" of The Wreck. Now, Mr Tatler, I am sure that the gentleman who has confidence enough to do these things, can neither sin in his pronunciation nor his style. Let me tell you it requires some brain to take down the words of an actor from the back of the pit; and this ability Mr WILLIAMS has evidently displayed in his new edition of The Wreck. I am, your's,

PERFORMANCES OF SATURDAY NIGHT.

DRURY-LANE.—Hofer—High-Ways and By-Ways—And Der Freischuts.

COVENT GARDEN.—Isabella—The Highland Reel—And The Irish Tutor.

As there are no performances at the theatres during the present week, we shall take an opportunity of resting from our criticisms. We should have had an article in to-day's paper upon one of the pieces performed on Saturday night, but a severe cold happening to seize us, and threatening to bring on a worse illness if not attended to, we thought it would be better to forego one evening's criticism, rather than stand a chance of doing away all the good we should derive from our week's good hours. ☞

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

TUESDAY, MARCH 29, 1831.

SIR WALTER SCOTT versus REFORM.

A JOURNAL devoted to literature cannot witness unconcerned the movements of literary men; and as Sir Walter Scott has given a deplorable specimen of the mistakes which such men can run into on the side of politics, when they have been accustomed to subject their understandings to

"All that the nurse, and all the priest have taught,"— we trust that in these new and more liberal times of government, we shall not be thought to trespass unwarrantably on newspaper ground, by taking some notice of it. We shall begin by repeating the handsome, commiserating remarks made upon it in the Times of yesterday:—

'We publish, from an Evening Paper, the report of an anti-reform meeting in Scotland, composed of freeholders, magistrates, &c.,—Tory tools, as may be well imagined, of the powers heretofore exercising dominion over a Scottish county. If that report contains matter to excite contempt or indignation in other respects, in one it has moved our compassion and sincere regret. It presents to us the picture of Sir Walter Scott,—broken down by disease and conscious infirmity, but urged on by what still remains of the original tendencies and vivid impressions of his high feudal spirit,—condescending to become, at this heart-inspiring moment, the mourner for condemned absurdities. Has, then, the living earth whirled on, and left the grey novelist alone in his land of self-created mist and light—of courts, and camps, and chiefs, and dames, and lakes, and towers, and multifarious witchery? Long still may this great ruler of the realms of fiction enjoy and communicate to others those delights which an active cultivation of the resources of his own vast domain is so well calculated to furnish! Within that region, Sir Walter Scott need indulge no revolutionary terrors: there, no conspiracy can molest his person—no republican will dream of attempting to undermine his throne. He rules, and will rule over a loyal universe; but, alas! who shall name his successor?

'This mighty minister to the innocent pleasures of his own and future ages would nevertheless do wisely to know the limits of his proper field, and to act within it. He has made history, whenever he touched it, a romance. His politics are already a chimera.'

Now for the speech which called forth this generous and sensible rebuke. We shall intersperse our comments in the text, just as men, with a strong interest in a subject, do while they are reading anything that excites them;—just as any of our readers would in perusing the speech themselves. Its chief characteristics are—1st, the indignation of the habitual and long-successful Tory, in waking up from the dream which he and his party have been indulging, and finding that men are no longer children (for that is the real secret of his accusing them of being children): 2nd, the old Quarterly-Review gratuitousness, or rather nullity, of the reasoning, which will do no longer, and makes these people mad to find it so: and 3rd, the fantastic assumption or retention of a right to talk about the Constitution and Providence; as if their politics had not always violated the constitution, and their theology blackened the sky. Sir Walter Scott says, in a note to one of his Tales of the Crusaders, that evil predominates in the mundane economy,—that there is more evil than good in this fair creation. We do not believe there is, great as the evil may be; nay, we are sure that there is not, anxious as we are to diminish that evil. But what are we to think of the education which leads a man to think as Sir Walter Scott does; and at the same time to oppose every chance for making the world better?—chances, which for aught he can tell to the contrary, not only man wishes, but God wishes; and which the perpetual incitement which mankind feel to improve their condition, may be the destined and necessary means of bringing about? This unceasing impulse is one of the most remarkable facts in the history of the world: new and extraordinary facts are now giving it more hope than ever; and are we then to be told, purely in order to indulge the vanity, or the querulousness, or the less pardonable and petty interest of the leaders of one small passing generation, who have helped to make true their gloomy notions, that their little span of life, or even the little span of the life of all history (for it is but a little span, as far as we know it), is to set up its atom of the shadow against all which man and God can do for the glad enlightenment of the globe?

'Sir Walter Scott said, that he had no intention of intruding himself upon the meeting, as his voice was nearly gone, and he was not otherwise well; but the present was so important an occasion, that entertaining the clear opinions that he did upon the subject, if he were to lose his life in consequence of his appearance at the meeting, he would willingly yield his last breath in opposition to the measure now before Parliament.' (Hisses.)

Alas! that the breath of the life which inspired the Scotch novels should go out in such a cause! that genius should die in defence of ignorance! a man worth much, for a party worth nothing! "Willingly" die for the boroughmongers! A wilful man, they say, must have his way, and rue it. But we hope the saying in this case will not be verified. What a thing is the nursery, that it should haunt a man like this to his last hour, and make him willing to die in honor of the memory of Mr Dundas! for there is nothing better in the aspiration. It is the pure dotage of the early habit.

'He would tell those who were disposed to indulge in hissing, which they had no title to do at that meeting, that it did not affect him more than the hissing of a number of geese.'

Good. Hissing is an argument certainly; but what have the ganders of boroughmongering been doing for the last forty years but hissing on his Majesty's high-way, and taking their petulance for superiority? What is scandal but hissing? half-reasoning abuse but hissing? What did the "Beacon" intend to do but to hiss, and to endeavour to thrust honest men from a "level consideration" by a begging of the question, and a muster of silly breaths? Men might hiss as much as they pleased at the Reformers. There was no talk of geese then. But the moment the hiss comes round the other way, the language of contempt is to change sides.

'His friend Mr Bell had afforded him several instances of the dangers to be apprehended from the intended measure. He disliked the moment in which the measure was brought forward—he disliked the feelings that spurred on its supporters. Tney knew of the last revolution in France,—how it happened he would not stop to inquire; all that he would say was, that the persons who climbed to the democratic part of the constitution, had obtained the advantage which they desired, and they obtained their own government in the way which they thought best. This has set fire to a train over the land that has burned far and wide.'

The train that was fired by the starving poor burned far and wide enough to enlighten the country as to the necessity of its present measures. There is a good deal of obscurity in some of these passages, owing perhaps to mistakes of the press. What is meant by "climbing to the democratic part of the constitution?" and obtaining the government in the way the climbers "thought best?" Sir Walter "dislikes the moment in which the Reform is brought forward!" No doubt he does, because it is the moment of all others the most favourable. He "dislikes the feelings that spurred on its supporters." What feelings? His dislike is no argument. He would "not stop to inquire" how the last revolution in France "happened." Of course not, for every word of his inquiry would be of necessity as futile, and tend to do him as much mischief, as the articles in the Quarterly have done his side of the question. The whole of this passage is a remarkable though not a fortunate specimen of the art of saying nothing under pretence of not wanting it.

'France for ages has been imitating our constitution, but not fairly. She has been always trying to add something to it, to render it more exquisite; but in this she constantly failed. There were no less than 13 different constitutions, and this he believed was the 14th within our recollection, and in every one of them France had made a constitution that in the course of a year was found inapplicable. And was it from France that Britain was to imitate a constitution, and to depart from its own which had given happiness and victory to the country, and had carried its glory to a height to which France had never been able to attain? He was moreover convinced that we would have war with the French—that they would never cease to be hostile to us as long as the remembrance of the battle of Waterloo remained impressed upon their minds; and that this country could not be considered in a state of safety as long as they could do us any harm without imminent danger to themselves.'

This is another specimen of the tendency of Sir Walter to think ill of his species. We believe that the French are better men than the Pitts and Dundasses from whom he has taken his notions of human nature, and that they can recover the impression of the battle of Waterloo for nobler thoughts. The Duke of Wellington, Sir Walter may be assured, is not so great a man in the eyes of the French, as he is in those of the Tories. They can forgive him the battle of Waterloo; partly no doubt, because they think his "genius" had not much to do with winning it. And if it had, what had Lafayette and the Liberals to do with the battle, one way or the other? And they are the men who will settle France. The constitutional experiments, of which Sir Walter has made such a candid display, took place in the most unexpected and struggling times; and at all events, the imitation of England, of which he accuses them, is no proof of French hostility to our nation. The time is gone by when people are to be the dupes of such halloos to the war-dogs.

'He (Sir Walter) had himself seen a little of the extreme degree of the ingenuity of the French in imitating our devices. They wished to introduce from this country an iron bridge. They sent to an engineer of this country to have such a bridge placed over the Seine, near Marly. The first thing that the French engineers did was to examine the drawings; and they declared that the bridge intended would not do,—that it was not elegant enough—that it was altogether English, and, as such, they set about altering all those counterpoises which were necessary to give it stability; but they no sooner set it up in this condition than it turned upside down. (A laugh.) It was quite the same thing with regard to their constitution—they tried to make it better, and we now saw the end of it.'

What does the Baronet mean by this? Does he mean the end of the rascally government of Charles X? And what signifies his story of the engineer? Foolish engineers are to be found in England as well as France, who would equally mar an improvement fetched from abroad. But what does Sir Walter say to the great French chemists and astronomers, who have improved upon the lessons we taught them,—lessons, too, which no men have been more willing to acknowledge? Sir Isaac Newton is one of the most honoured names in France. Franklin is another name revered in France. Washington is another; Bentham another.

Why does he pretend to know nothing of what all the world knows, and bring up a story of which they do not know anything, and which probably has been imposed upon his "willing ear?"

'In repairing an old edifice that had withstood the flood and the winds of ages, we should be cautious not to destroy its symmetry; —"we should let well abide well." The tree under which we and our fathers have slumbered for ages, we should not be rash in cutting down. He (Sir Walter) had heard much of the success of the Union. How long was it in being successful? More than fifty years—men's hair had turned grey before this success made its appearance; and they now had their hopes realized. Although the worst of miseries were brought into our country by an innovation so much to be deprecated, it would in the government of the world be brought round. The crop came in God Almighty's time; but we should not be rash enough to sanction changes which were very likely to occasion evils of no ordinary kind, instead of continuing to live quietly and peaceably, as we have done hitherto.'

As who have done hitherto? The boroughmongers and placemen? Yes, certainly; but who else? The hard-working part of the tax-payers? the starving part of the tax-payers? the multitudes who are advised to emigrate? Was it "well" with all these? Is over-taxation, and poverty, and famine, and death, "well abiding?" It is quite astonishing to see what the habit of assumption and assertion has done with the cleverest of the Tories, and how it enables them to repeat to the last their old gratuitous words, till everybody is twenty times sick. If Sir Walter Scott and his fathers have been slumbering for ages under the tree of corruption, the many have been in a very bad way under that Banian, and had a miserable night's rest of it. "Cut it down," for God's sake, "and cast it into the fire."

'He should take leave of them with the adage of the gladiators to the Emperor of old, "Morituri te salutant;"—if we pass this, we shall be undone.'

We hope this quotation is only a sickly fancy of Sir Walter's; otherwise we should regret saying anything about his speech. But his friends must excuse us, if we cannot help thinking of him rather as an immortal man, than a perishable one, and regretting in proportion that he should make this exhibition of political weakness.

'Mr William Bell said, that it was only now that he had come to a knowledge of what those grounds were which the opponents to this measure advanced as the grounds of their opposition; which might be resolved into this,—the danger of introducing a new quality of voters among the tenantry. Our opponents say that the constitution as it now stands is perfect, and ought not to be changed. Is there a man in this assembly can believe such a statement? But we say that a change is required, and it ought to be a change of extension. Reference had been made in regard to changes that were to take place in the constitution as it now stood; and although the similes with which this was accompanied were good in themselves, and the theories which they raised upon them magnificent, where was their application to the present question?'

'Sir Walter Scott said—God forbid that I should be against all reform. We have occasion no doubt for reform, but it ought to begin first in our own bosoms. What I am against is, proceeding incautiously. With regard to the constitution of this country (continued Sir Walter), he might say of it Pondere librat suo,—her other powers balance each other. It was very seldom that these powers came into violent contact with each other. If they were to destroy any of these powers, they would destroy the balance of the constitution, by extending the power of the people, and deprive themselves of the means of mending it. He could only compare the present measure to a watch placed in the hands of an unskilful person, who by turning the regulator backwards and forwards, without a knowledge of its machinery, broke it in pieces; and now we have got a repeater in the hands of children, and God knows what is to become of it.'

Mr Bell was too complimentary to Sir Walter's similes. That of the balance is one of the oldest, most worn out, and most false, imaginable. What is a balance, of which the smallest scale is at once up aloft in the air, and proposterously full of gold and luxuries, while the largest is down on the earth, empty? And what a simile is this of the watch! What a total want of analogy! What an immeasurable disproportion in the circumstances! It is a pretty, Tory, toy-like simile for a gentleman to take out of his pocket after dinner, and smile over, and be satisfied; but what are the multitudes to say to it, who are starving? What have they to do with this genteel and tranquil simile of the watch? How are their broken hearts to be put to rights by a figure of speech? or to be kept lingering and in torture, while such fumblers as Eldon and Co. "see what can be done?" We have heard of watchmakers, who so treat a watch, brought to them to be mended, that it is sure to be carried back to them in a short time, to give them another job. If similes must be taken from this much injured, machine, this would be a better one than any we have heard yet. Sir Walter is for beginning reform in "one's own bosom," a very definite and obvious place no doubt, and such as tends to certify and encourage the progress of all reformation. But who is to bring up the first corrupt place in it for disfranchisement? And what will the Sir Wetherells of the human breast (odd metaphors, fit for such gentry!) say to being "ordered out?" Sir Walter talks,—surely not with any great modesty, allowing him all his genius,—of the watch's having got in "the hands of children." Many of those children are as old as himself; have seen and suffered as much as himself, probably more; and at all events, were not brought up in the bigotted nursery that he was; to the notions taught in which he has evidently been a victim all his life,—a lucky one for us as far as romances go, but a very bad one for himself and all whom he has influenced, in their views, both of the political and moral government of the world. This great novelist and most small philosopher has not scrupled to preach to his juvenile readers, in one of his late works, the cruel and impious doctrine of eternal punishment! So much for grown "children."

Judge Rooke.—Judge Rooke, in going the Western circuit, had a large stone thrown at his head; but, from the circumstance of his stooping very much, it passed over him. "You see," said he to his friends, "that, had I been an upright Judge, I might have been killed."

The Costume of a Otaheitan Judge.—A short time after our arrival some offenders were brought to trial, and as we were desirous of witnessing the proceedings of the court, it was removed from its usual site, to the shade of some trees in our immediate vicinity. The court was ranged upon benches placed in successive rows under the trees, with the prisoners in front, under the charge of an officer with a drawn sabre, and habited in a volunteer's jacket and a maro. The cavi-rai of the district in which the crimes had been committed, took his place between the court and the prisoners, dressed in a long straw mat, finely plaited, and edged with fringe with a slit cut in it for the head to pass through; a white oakum wig, which, in imitation of the gentlemen in our courts of law, flowed in long curls over his shoulders, and a tall cap surmounting it, curiously ornamented with red feathers, and with variously coloured tresses of human hair. His appearance without shoes, stockings, or trowsers, the strange attire of the head, with the variegated tresses of hair mingling with the oakum curls upon his shoulders, produced, as may be imagined, a ludicrous effect.—Beechey's Voyage to the Pacific.

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

"The little and short sayings of wise and excellent men are of great value, like the dust of gold, or the least sparks of diamonds."—Tillotson.

— There is none can baffle men of sense but fools; on whom they can make no impression.—Shenstone.

— When His Majesty's carriage drove into the Stable-yard at St James's, on Wednesday, a jolly tar saluted him with a characteristic cheer, "Huzza for King William! the Reform Bill for ever!" It is said His Majesty was highly gratified at this homely and familiar pun upon his name.

Chinese Funerals.—The funerals of the rich are more expensive than their marriages. The color used is a light blue for the lanterns, decorations, &c. whilst the mourning is white and grey. Splendid processions with music take place, and I have been told that ten or fifteen thousand dollars have been known to be spent on a funeral. * * * * Choosing the situation of a tomb is one of the nicest and most important matters that can be agitated, for on it is supposed to depend the peace of the departed friend, as well as the good or bad fortune of his surviving relations. * * * * Whilst the living are seen inhabiting the low marshy ground, the dead occupy the high, airy, and beautiful situations, commanding a fine view of the country round! A Chinese tomb is in the form of a crescent, bearing an inscription in red letters.—Dobell's Travels in China.

A Bold Experiment.—The Missionaries had for several years endeavoured to produce a change of religion in the island (Otaheite) by explaining to the natives the fallacy of their belief, and assuring them that the threats of their deities were absurd; Hettotte at length determined to put their assertions to the test, by a breach of one of the strictest laws of his religion, and resolved either to die under the experiment, or to embrace the new faith. A custom prevailed of offering pigs to the deity, which were brought to the morai and placed upon whattas, or fautas, for the purpose. From that moment they were considered sacred, and if afterwards any human being, the priests excepted, dared to commit so great a sacrilege as to partake of the offering, it was supposed that the offended god would punish the crime with instant death. Hettotte thought a breach of this law would be a fair criterion of the power of the deity, and accordingly stole some of the consecrated meat, and retired with it to a solitary part of the wood, to eat it, and perhaps to die. Having partaken of the food, he expected at each mouthful to experience the vengeance he had provoked, and he waited a considerable time in the wood in awful suspense; until, finding himself rather refreshed than otherwise, by his meal, he quitted the retreat, and went quietly home. For several days he kept his secret, but finding no bad effects from his transgression, he disclosed it to every one, renounced his religion, and embraced Christianity.—Beechey's Voyage to the Pacific.

The First Adventure of a Scotch Privateer.—A Scotch seaman, named Mackay, had got together a band of English and American sailors of desperate fortunes, to the number of five and twenty, who went forth in a crazy old barge, scarcely big enough to contain them, to run down the coast of Peru, in search of adventures. They could hardly muster sufficient money to purchase a few stores for the enterprise, and were so closely packed in the boat, that it was impossible for them to move a single step. * * * One fine morning, about six weeks afterwards, when it was blowing a top-gallant breeze, a stately ship, under a cloud of canvass, came sailing into harbour, and dropped her anchor opposite to the fort. When the visit boat went out, the officer, upon boarding her, was surprised to find Mackay and his comrades in possession of the ship. She was a Spanish ship of four hundred tons burden, called the Mercurio. Her cargo was valued at three hundred thousand dollars. She had just arrived from Cadiz, and was the first vessel that had been captured from the Spanish since the revolution; she was afterwards purchased by the Chilian government, for a transport. The adventurers, in their fruit bark, had coasted along, aided by the current which constantly sets from South to North, until they came off Arica, where they saw a large vessel in the harbour, and waiting until night-fall, they ran quietly along-side with muffled oars, and boarded her so suddenly, that the watch was taken by surprise, and the crew, after a slight resistance, in which several Spaniards were killed, betook themselves to the boat, or jumped overboard, and swam to shore. The boarders then cut the cable, and running the ship out of the range of the battery, which had opened a heavy fire on the first alarm being given, they soon got safe to sea. * * *. It was ludicrous to see the sailors who had accompanied Mackay, most of whom had five thousand dollars each, for his own share of the prize. Money was no value to them, and the doubloons were scattered about Valparaiso, with the most reckless prodigality. It was not uncommon for a sailor to purchase from a Guazo, who had come from the country, his horse, bridle, and saddle, just as they were; for which he, of course, gave double the value to the owner, in cash. Jack, having struck this bargain, would make the former master dismount, and, getting on the horse, would ride the poor creature about the beach at a gallop, until both horse and rider were tired; Jack would then dismount and turn the animal "adrift," by which means the original owner frequently regained possession of the horse, and rode home upon it, with the money he had received, as its value, still in his pocket.—Haigh's Sketches of Buenos Ayres, &c.

Singular Mode of Catching Ducks.—The Karaikees catch a great many wild ducks with nets, which they let fall over the precipices and cliffs along the sea-coast, where those ducks sit in the cavities of the rocks. As the net falling down frightens them, they fly against it, and are caught in the meshes, sometimes twenty or thirty at a time.—Dobell's Travels in Kamschatka.

The Effects of Habit.—The path leading down this ravine is, in many places, so precipitous, that we were constantly in danger of slipping and rolling into the depths below, which the assistance of the natives alone prevented. While we were thus borrowing help from others, and grasping every tuft of grass and bough that offered its friendly support, we were overtaken by a group of chubby little children, trudging unconcernedly on, munching a water melon, and balancing on their heads calabashes of water, which they had brought from the opposite side of the island. They smiled at our helplessness as they passed, and we felt their innocent reproof; but we were still unpractised in such feats, while they from being trained to them, had acquired a footing and a firmness which habit alone can produce.—Beechey's Voyage to the Pacific.

— Sir Thomas More, when Lord Chancellor, succeeded in disposing of all causes that were ready for hearing; and on his desiring the Registrar to call the next cause, he was told that none remained on the list, which fact he ordered to be recorded. This event was also commemorated in doggrel, as follows:—

"When More some years had Chancellor been,
No more suits did remain;
The same shall never more be seen,
Till More be there again."

The poet was wrong, however. We need not go far for an instance of a living Judge to whom the same merit may be as justly ascribed; and a correspondent has enabled us to celebrate the circumstance as melodiously:—

"A Judge sat on the judgment seat,
A goodly Judge was he;
He said unto the Registrar,
'Now call a cause to me.'
'There is no cause,' said Registrar,
And loud laughed he with glee.
'A cunning Leach hath despatched them all,
I can call no cause to thee.'"

A Chinese Dinner Party.—When a Chinese invites to a ceremonious dinner, a large red paper is sent several days before the time. On this is written the invitation in the politest terms of the language. * * * On the day before a feast, another invitation is sent to the guests, on rose-coloured paper, to remind them of it, and to ascertain whether they are coming. Again on the next day, a short time before the hour appointed, the invitation is repeated, to inform them that the feast is prepared and awaits them. When the guests are assembled, the first thing presented is warm almond milk, in large cups. Every table is served with exactly the same food, and the same number of dishes, at one and the same moment. (Only four or five persons sit at each table. In very fashionable houses, not more than two or three). The tables are mostly of polished ebony, or Surat black wood, and are double; for, as they use no table-cloths, the upper table is removed, with all that is on it, at the end of the first course, to give place to the second. For the first course, the tables are laid out with chop-stick, wine-cups, china-ware, or enamelled spoons and stands, and two little plates with fruits, nuts, &c. Several small cold dishes, such as dry salted fish, shred fine, and made into a salad with mushrooms, &c. are spread over the board, only leaving room in the centre for a cup about the size of a breakfast-cup. The dinner now commences, and all the wine cups are filled with Sew-heng-Tsow, (a weak acidulated liquor, distilled from millet-seed, and always drunk hot), and the master of the feast rises, as well as all the guests; he holds the wine-cup in both his hands, saluting them with it, after which they all drink together, and sit down again. A cup with hot food is now served in the centre of every table. * * * * After the first course, the upper table is removed, and the table remaining is spread with spoons, wine-cups, chop-sticks, vinegar, soy, and sweet sauce, with some plates of sliced radishes, pears, oranges, and various other fruits and vegetables, placed before each person: and all the large fruits are sliced, as well as the vegetables. While the second course is preparing, those who are tired of sitting, rise and walk about the room. The second table being prepared, the guests are all seated again, when bird's-nest soup, the most expensive and the greatest delicacy a Chinese can offer, is served up, with pigeon's or plover's eggs, floating upon it, to each person. When entertaining any of the high constituted authorities, the master puts the first dish of the second course on every table himself, as it is brought in by the servants. * * * * * After all, tea is served up in covered cups, as before described; on the leaves, and without milk or sugar; and thus closes the entertainment. * * * * * On the day following the feast, the host sends a large red paper to each of the guests, apologizing for the badness of the dinner; and they answer him on the same sort of paper, expressing in the most exalted and extravagant terms the pleasure and unbounded satisfaction his feast has afforded them.—Dobell's Travels in China.

SIBERIAN BUTTER-DRINKERS.—The Yakuts mix sour milk and cream together in leathern bags, which, after one has travelled a few hours on horseback, becomes butter and butter-milk; the butter collecting in small lumps from the size of a pea to that of a marble. A Yakut drinks the butter and butter-milk together, or eats the butter by handfuls with his boiled meat, oftentimes in such quantities as, were I to relate it, would exceed belief! I found, however, by experience, that butter and sour butter-milk eaten together, are much lighter on the stomach, than butter eaten in the usual way. In another passage, the author says, "It is almost incredible how great a quantity of melted butter a Yakut will consume at a sitting. A gentlemen who has lived many years amongst them, assured me that he has seen at a wedding-feast the great butter-drinkers consume from twenty to thirty pounds per man! The master of the house deems himself honored, and is much delighted, to see half a dozen great butter-drinkers come to his feast, and these contend with each other in gluttony."—Dobell's Travels in Kamschatka and Siberia.

AMIABLE AND LEARNED BEARS.—Dobell, in his Travels in Kamschatka, &c. asserts that the bears of that country never kill the cattle when they can obtain fish. "It appears that they prefer fish and berries to every other food; nor will a fat bear attack a man unless hunted or wounded. The Kamschatdales say that if a bear kills a man, however hungry he may be, he does not eat him, but carefully scrapes a hole, puts him into it, and covers him up with dirt and leaves." This robin-like tenderness seems rather extraordinary in an animal whose very embraces are considered as formidable; but it appears that the bear of Kamschatka is remarkable for its amiability. "In no part of the world, perhaps, are bears more numerous than at Kamschatka, and nowhere are they so gentle. They rove about the plains in large droves, yet they never disturb the women and girls, who gather roots and herbs, or turf for fuel, in the very midst of them; nay, they will even eat out of their hands."—A Natural History, drawn from the writings of Buffon, &c.—[One marvels more that "the women and girls" should give them the opportunity. This gentleness is not owing to any particular security enjoyed by the animal, since it is shewn that the Kamschatdales have so many uses for it, that they make unceasing war upon the whole fraternity. According to the two works abovementioned, they are indebted to the bear not only for a great portion of their dwellings, furniture, clothing, &c. for food, and light; but also for their knowledge of physic and surgery, "which they acquire by noticing what herbs the animal applies to his wounds, or eats when he is labouring under disease." It assists them, too, in agriculture, for they make sickles of its shoulder-blades; and even in the elegancies of life, the Kamschatdales are the pupils of this amiable creature, for from him they derive their skill and grace in dancing. Nor do they deny to their instructors the honor due to them, since they bestow the name of the bear upon the dance taught them by that kind quadruped.]

POWERS OF THE FLEA.—The great agility and strength of this insect are exceedingly remarkable, it being able to leap further in proportion to its own length than, perhaps, any other creature that has not wings to help it; and its strength is so well known, and so extraordinary in the same proportion, that several curious artists, whose dexterity has been shown in the making curiosities of an uncommon and surprising smallness, have employed this little animal to assist in exhibiting their works, and proving the nicety and lightness of them. Dr Power says he saw among Tradescant's rarities, a golden chain of three hundred links, though not above an inch long, that was both fastened to and drawn away by a flea. Moufet some time before this, mentions such another, of a finger's length, made by one Mark, an Englishman, whereto a flea was fastened by a collar of a most exquisite minuteness with a lock and key adapted to it. This chain the flea dragged after him with ease, the flea, chain, lock and key, not exceeding altogether the weight of a single grain. He adds further, that he had been informed by the people of undoubted credit, that a coach made of gold, with all its furniture of the same metal, had a flea chained to it, which drew it along without the least difficulty; thereby testifying at the same time the dexterity of the workman, and the strength of this little creature. Nor is there any room to doubt the truth of these accounts; for one Boverick, a watchmaker in the Strand, has lately made and shewn to vast numbers of people, not only a chaise having four wheels and all its proper apparatus, together with a man sitting therein, the whole formed of ivory, and drawn along by a flea; but likewise a landau that opens and shuts by springs, with six horses harnessed thereto, a coachman sitting on the box, with a dog between his legs, four people in the landau, two footmen behind it, and a postilion riding one of the fore-horses. This equipage a flea is fastened to, and pulls very easily along. He has also made a chain of brass, about two inches in length, containing two hundred links, with a hook at one end, and a padlock and key at the other; all which together weigh less than the third part of a grain. Here the flea is made use of to draw the chain, which it does very nimbly, and with as little trouble as can be well imagined. Fleas thus employed are preserved alive and vigorous, by putting them upon the arm, or the back of the hand, to feed, once or twice a day,—Micrographia Restaurata.

ANECDOTE OF D'AUBIGNE.—We find in the Memoirs of D'Aubigné, an anecdote that is worthy of notice. In a battle that was fought during the wars of Henry the Fourth, D'Aubigné had a personal combat with a captain of the name of Dubourg. During the heat of the action, D'Aubigné perceived that an arquebusade had set fire to a bracelet formed of his mistress's hair, which he wore on his arm; without thinking of the advantage he gave his adversary, he instantly employed himself in extinguishing the fire, and preserving this precious bracelet, which was dearer to him than liberty or life. Captain Dubourg sympathised with and respected the sentiment, suspended his attack, inclined the point of his sword, and began to trace on the sand a globe surmounted with a cross.—Memoirs of Madame de Genlis.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

Sketches of Venetian History. In Two Vols. Volume the First. 12mo. pp. 446. (Being the Twentieth Volume of the Family Library.) Murray.

This is an attractive little thick book, elegantly got up, with some very nice plates, and a subject of which readers have often desired to know more. People in general get what acquaintance they have with Venice from pictures and plays; but from that circumstance, as well as from the effect itself, the character of Venetian history in their imaginations partakes more of romance than most others. They will find a good account of it in the present summary, as far as we have been able judge; nor will the book be considered less a curiosity, as coming from its present publisher, and at the present moment: for though the writer is willing to philosophize in as gentlemanly a manner as possible on the subject, the horrors of an oligarchy are brought plainly enough before us. We have left ourselves no time for remarks. We can only make an extract, for the present; but it is a curious one, as shewing how the people were tricked into having a noblesse. What the author says about the natural growth of wealth and nobility together would be plausible, if he had not omitted the little question of primogeniture, which soon settles all that part of the business.

'Two years before he was disengaged from the second Genoese war,' (towards the end of the thirteenth century) 'Gradenigo obtained a decree of the Great Council, which may be esteemed the corner stone upon which the future, pure oligarchy of Venice was consolidated. Hitherto, if we have spoken of different classes existing in this state, the distinction between them must be considered much more as conventional, than as resulting from positive institutions. The population of Venice can scarcely be said to have been separated into Patrician and Plebeian, by any of those marked and decided boundaries which struck a deep and early root in other communities. Her origin was friendly to the preservation of as much equality as can practically exist in any large society; and the want of all landed territory had kept her aloof from the introduction of the Feudal System, with its accompaniments of Lordship and Vassalage. Still wherever numbers of men are congregated into one body, some pre-eminence must be attained; some individuals will command greater respect, and consequently exercise greater influence than their contemporaries. This superiority, in the first instance, will, probably be accorded to talent; and those who possess the most intimate knowledge of the nature of their fellow men, will be most likely to obtain the earliest guidance of their conduct. Wealth will next establish a claim to regard; and, as riches are more frequently transmitted to posterity than ability, the first distinctions of what may be called hereditary rank will accrue to the families possessed of most substance. It is easy to perceive in what manner these advantages, when once obtained, (and the lapse of very few years in any Civilized Society cannot but bestow them) will lead to a virtual if not an acknowledged separation of classes; and it is natural to suppose that those who, in any way, are elevated above their brethren, will find both the readiest access to magisterial offices, and the surest method of retaining them; so that hence also arises another source of distinction. Such appears to have been the progress of what, in conformity with the habits of other countries, we must name the Venetian nobility.

'The Great Council, placed, in its very outset, beyond the reach of popular suffrage, had gradually eluded even the slight control of annual election. Without being able to trace the progress of usurpation, step by step, it may be enough to say that it attributed to itself the right of naming the twelve electors by whom it was to be renewed; and consequently, that in point of fact, it re-elected itself. Hence, for the most part, its members were chosen from the same families, or rather, generally consisted of the same individuals who had once obtained seats in it. Still, at least in name, it was neither permanent nor exclusive. No one affirmed an hereditary claim to its honours; no one asserted that he belonged to it otherwise than as a representative: and the poorest citizen, however conscious that he could never hope for enrolment upon its list of Sages, contented himself with the belief that there was no other obstacle to so bright a fortune except improbability.

'Even this consolatory fallacy was now to be dissipated. In the last reign, a proposition had been made, that the annual electors should be instructed never to choose any Member who had not himself already been admitted, or who was unable to prove the admission of some ancestor. Dandolo, who favoured the popular interests, opposed this project, and it was rejected: Gradenigo obtained the same object by a more circuitous route. Assuming that, as the annual elections had almost invariably fallen upon the same individual, those individuals had, therefore, established a right, he did not so much support the claim of re-election to a body of which he already held them to be constituent Members, as the necessity of determining whether they were still worthy of continuing in it. This artful representation, as will be seen at once, wholly changed the nature of the Council. To effect this purpose, the Doge proposed that a list of all that had been Members during the last four years should be submitted to the XL, and that every member who united twelve of their suffrages should retain his seat. At the expiration of a year, the same scrutiny was to be repeated. To prevent the appearance of an entire exclusion of all but this favoured class, three members of the Council were instructed to form a supplementary list of citizens elegible without having already sat. These were limited in number by the Signory, and were balloted for, in like manner, by the XL. It is needless to speak of the class from which this list was selected: it was similar to that of the existing members. The decree passed, and bears in history the name of The Closing of the Council. (La Serrata del mazor Conscio.) It was not such in fact; but it was the first step towards it and the others were rapidly trodden. During the next two years, the XL returned exactly the same members. In the third, all names were excluded from the supplementary list, but those of persons who themselves or ancestors had been members. A subsequent statute spoke of the positive exclusion of those who were contemptuously termed New Men. Not long after, a register was opened, in which all qualified persons, having attained the age of eighteen, were required to inscribe their names; and, lastly, the periodical renewals, and the supplementary lists were swept away; the existing Council was declared permanent and hereditary; and whoever could prove the ancestral right was permitted, when five and twenty years old, to assert his claim, as the form ran, per suos et per viginti quinque annos; to be enrolled in the Golden Book (Il Libro D'Oro) of Nobility, and thus to be admitted as a Member of the Great Council. Thirty dispensations—at first decided by lot, afterwards sometimes accorded by merit, but more frequently put up to sale—were also granted, by which such young Patricians as obtained them might take their seats at the age of twenty-one. They were also named I Barberini, because they were elected on the Feast of San Barco.

'In later days, the Nobility were arranged, if not formally, at least conventionally, in four classes. The most distinguished, Gli Elettorali, were descendants of the twelve tribunes by whom the first Doge had been elected in the year 697: to these were annexed four families, whose representatives, in conjunction with the above-mentioned twelve, signed an instrument for the foundation of the abbey of San Georgio Maggiore, in the year 800. Of these, the former are sometimes spoken of as I dodici Apostoli, the latter as I quatro Evangelisti. Six other families were also admitted without hesitation to the first class; and there were two or three besides whose claims were more or less contested; this class furnished more than half her doges to the Republic. The second class consisted of those whose ancestors were Members of the Grand Council at the time of its closing, and each of these has had its Doge. The third comprised thirty families admitted after the war of Chiozza, in return for the great services which they had rendered to the State; three of these also have produced a doge. The fourth and lowest class originated among Venetian Citizens, Candiotes, or other Provincials, who, during the Turkish wars, upon which we have not yet entered, gratified their own vanity and relieved the necessities of the Republic by purchasing Nobility at the market-price of one hundred thousand ducats. Only one Doge was elevated from this division, and singularly enough, it was Manini, the last Sovereign of his Country. These four classes of Nobility altogether seldom exceeded twelve hundred in number, but to these must be added another, which must be considered honorary. It included such illustrious foreigners (and among these more than one crowned head was numbered) as had solicited or received inscription in the Golden Book. This honour was very jealously guarded, and it was not without extreme difficulty that Gregory XIIIth obtained admission for one of his bastard sons. All illegitimate children of the native Nobility, even those who had been legitimated by a subsequent marriage, were rigourously excluded; and the Council, after long deliberation upon the style by which the Pope's nephew would be recognized, at last decided upon a form sufficiently ambiguous to remove its scruples; Il Signor Giacomo Buoncompagno, stretto parente di sua Santità—a near relation of his Holiness.

'Besides the above distinction of the nobles into classes, there was a yet more summary mode of distinguishing them: the rich were termed I signori; the poor, who formed two-thirds of the body, and who chiefly inhabited the cheap quarter of San Barnabo, I Barnaboti. Or, retaining Barnaboti for the last, the wealthiest were named, in a sort of slang language, Sangue blò or Sangue Colombin, Blue blood or Pigeon's blood; the moderately rich, Morèl di mezo, middle piece. The pride of birth, however, was discouraged as much as possible in Venice, when it led to comparisons which might occasion disunion among the nobility; and one of the ordinances of that most fearful tribunal which we shall have occasion to notice hereafter, the Inquisition of State, directed itself, with that which to most will appear disproportionate severity, against such as disparaged their brethren by boasting of their own superior antiquity. The spies entertained among the Patricians were warned to report all expressions of this tendency. The first offence was punished with six months' imprisonment in the Piombi, those fatal dungeons under the leads of the Ducal palace, from which few returned alive; for the second, the indiscreet babbler was to be drowned secretly. An anecdote is related by Amelot de la Houssaye, which, perhaps, may have been invented for the sake of the jest it contains, but which nevertheless well illustrates the spirit of the Venetian Government on this point. One of the Da Ponte family, in a dispute with a gentleman named Canale, boasted that the Ponti (Bridges) were much above the Canali (Canals); his antagonist replied, that the Canali were in being long before the existence of the Ponti. The Senate interfered, and informed the one that it possessed powers to fill up the Canals; the other, that it could knock down the Bridges.'—P. 212.

THE COUNCIL OF TEN.

'Ten Magistrates (I Dieci), named as a criminal court, were invested with a plenary inquisitorial authority, with an entire sovereignty over every individual in the State, and with freedom over all resposibility and appeal. Their duration was at first limited to ten days; but this was six times prolonged for a like period; then for a year; soon after for five; next for ten; and, in the end, the tribunal, with a great extension of powers, was declared to be permanent. These powers so frequently and fearfully intermingle themselves with the course of our future narrative, that we shall here but briefly touch upon them. The ten officers, from whom the Court derived its title, where chosen annually at four different assemblies of the Grand Council. No two of them might be members of the same family, or even bear the same name; and, from the colour of their robes of ceremony, they were termed I Neri, or the Black. To these, in after times, were added also the Signory, as assessors, termed, for a like reason, I Rossi, the Red. In their judicial administration, the members of this Council inquired, sentenced, and punished, according to what they called Reason of State. The public eye never penetrated the mystery of their proceedings; the accused was sometimes not heard—never confronted with witnesses; the condemnation was secret as the enquiry; the punishment undivulged like both. Nor was this all: instituted solely for the cognizance of State crimes, this Tribunal gradually attributed to itself the control of every branch of government, and exercised despotic influence over the questions of peace and war, over fiscal enactments, military arrangements, and negociations with foreign powers. It annulled, at pleasure, the decrees of the Grand Council, degraded its members, deposed, and even put to death the Chief Magistrate himself. An object alike of terror and detestation to those whom it oppressed under the pretext of salutary guardianship, it yet prolonged an uninterrupted sway during five centuries; and our wonder at the political problem of its long-continued existence is not a little heightened, when it is remembered that the Great Council, upon which, of all other classes, it weighed with far the most grievous burden, might, by refusing its votes at any one of the four elections in each year, have abolished its hateful yoke for ever. That it did not do so, may be attributed, in the outset, to a false view of the nature of the Magistracy, and to a belief that it was necessary for the preservation of the State. As its tyranny became more distinctly manifest, it may have been protected by an ambitious, but unworthy hope which each noble cherished, of one day wielding its immeasurable powers with his own hands. And, lastly, after a lapse of years had so far interwoven it with the general polity, as to make it seem an almost inseparable part of the whole, it might be saved by a mistaken, but little blameable reverence for antiquity; but that fond clinging to established institution, which, perhaps not unwisely, is backward to remove even an abuse, lest its extirpation may endanger the entire fabric upon which it is engrafted. We are here seeking a cause, not justifying a fact. Existence itself may be purchased at far too dear a price: but if existence alone were all that is demanded for the honour of a State, and the happiness of its subjects, it might not be too much to affirm, that the long stability of Venice was mainly owing to the most remarkable, the most formidable, and the most execrable part of the government—The Council of Ten.'—P. 232.

BOLD STROKE OF A TYRANT.

'On the death of the elder Carrara, the chief authority in Padua became vested in his nephew Ubertino. The restlessness of his ambition soon rendered him suspected at Venice; and there were not wanting many voices in the Senate to denounce him as a dangerous enemy. He is accused of having employed the stiletto, which had already become a powerful engine in Italian politics, to silence these opponents. On one occasion also, he acquired material strength by an outrage most daring indeed, but of a less dark character than assassination. Having learned the names of the senators most opposed to his interests, he seized them by night, and hurried them, bound, gagged, and blindfolded, in gondolas to Padua. There, in his own palace, he repeated to the astonished prisoners the arguments, the very words, which they had employed against him in the Councils, with which he had become acquainted through his spies. At first, he sternly threatened death; till, having succeeded in striking terror, he gradually relaxed the menace, and granted them liberty, under an oath that they would bury the adventure in secrecy; and for the future, adopt a policy more consonant with his wishes. On the same night they were re-conveyed to their homes; but, on parting, Carrara warned them of the dangers of perjury, significantly implying that he who could find agents for their abduction, had a much speedier vengeance at his command; and that he could readily employ daggers if they either betrayed or deceived him. The threat was effectual. The transaction was never revealed by the Venetian Senators; nor was it at all known till many years after its occurrence, and then only by the dying confession of some of the ruffians who had been engaged in its execution. Gataro, who has preserved this remarkable anecdote, implies the full success resulting from Ubertino's bold act, by stating that, during his life-time, the Signory of Venice said nothing more of war.'—P. 240.

VENICE SAVED BY ST. MARK. A TRADITION.

In the year 1341, an inundation, of many day's continuance, had raised the water three cubits higher than it had ever before been seen in Venice; and, during a stormy night, while the flood appeared to be still increasing, a poor, old fisherman sought what refuge he could find, by mooring his crazy bark close to the Riva di San Marco. The storm was yet raging when a person approached, and offered him a good fare if he would but ferry him over to San Giorgio Maggiore. "Who," said the ferryman, "can reach San Giorgio on such a night as this? Heaven forbid that I should try!" But as the stranger earnestly persisted in his request, and promised to guard him from harm, he at last consented. The passenger landed, and having desired the boatman to wait a little, returned with a companion, and ordered him to row to San Nicolo di Lido. The astonished fisherman again refused, till he was prevailed upon by a farther confident assurance of safety, and excellent pay. At San Nicolo they picked up a third person, and then instructed the boatman to proceed to the Two Castles at Lido. Though the waves ran fearfully high, the old man, by this time, had become accustomed to them, and, moreover, there was something about his mysterious crew which either silenced his fears, or diverted them from the tempest to his companions. Scarcely had they gained the strait, when they saw a galley, rather flying than sailing along the Adriatic, manned (if we say so) with devils, who seemed hurrying, with fierce and threatening gestures, to sink Venice in the deep. The sea, which had hitherto been furiously agitated, in a moment became unruffled; and the strangers, crossing themselves, conjured the Fiends to depart. At the word, the dæmoniacal galley vanished; and the three passengers were quietly landed at the spots at which each respectively had been taken up. The boatman, it seems, was not quite easy about his fare; and before parting, he implied pretty clearly, that the sight of this miracle after all, would be but bad pay. "You are right, my friend;" said the first passenger; "go to the Doge and the Procuratori, and assure them, that but for us three Venice would have been drowned. I am St Mark; my two comrades are St George and St Nicholas. Desire the magistrates to pay you; and add, that all this trouble has arisen from a Schoolmaster at San Felice, who first bargained with the Devil for his soul, and then hanged himself in despair! The fisherman, who seems to have had all his wits about him, answered, that he might tell that story, but he much doubted whether he should be believed: upon which St Mark pulled from his finger a gold ring, worth about five ducats, saying, "Shew them this ring, and bid them look for it in my treasury, whence it will be found missing." On the morrow, the fisherman did as he was told. The ring was discovered to be absent from its usual custody, and the fortunate boatman not only received his fare, but an annual pension to boot. Moreover a solemn procession and thanksgiving were appointed, in gratitude to the three holy corpses, which had rescued from such calamity the land affording them burial."—P. 242.

GAY'S OPINION OF THE MAN WHO FIRST EAT AN OYSTER.

If where fleet-ditch * with muddy current flows,
You chance to roam; where oyster-tubs in rows
Are rang'd beside the posts, there stay thy haste,
And with the savoury fish indulge thy taste.
The damsel's knife the gaping shell commands,
While the salt liquor streams between her hands.
The man had sure a palate cover'd o'er
With brass or steel, that on the rocky shore
First broke the oozy oyster's pearly coat,
And risk'd the living morsel down his throat.

SIR WALTER SCOTT'S SALLY AGAINST REFORM.

In the hurry in which we wrote our remarks on Sir Walter Scott's speech, we omitted to notice a curious passage, which produced the following sound exposition in yesterday evening's Globe.

'One argument of Sir Walter's,' observes the Globe, 'is characteristic of the temper of his mind. He not only attacks those changes which have not succeeded, but those which have been eventually successful. The case of the union of Scotland with England has been mentioned to show that great changes often produced great benefits, in spite of the alarm of their opponents. "He had heard much of the success of the Union," said Sir W. "How long was it in being successful? More than fifty years. Men's hairs had turned grey before this success made its appearance; and they now had their hopes realised. Although the worst of miseries were brought into the country by an innovation so much to be deprecated, it would, in the government of the world, be brought round. The crop came in God Almighty's time; but we should not be rash enough to sanction changes which were very likely to occasion evils of no ordinary kind, instead of continuing to live quietly and peaceably as we have hitherto done."

'This, we believe,' continues the Globe, 'expresses much of the feeling of those who are opposed to reform on other grounds than a mere calculation of political or pecuniary interest—"We wonna be fashed." Though they may think when the crop comes it will repay the seed and the toil, they think others may reap what they sow and plough for. Fortunately this feeling of indolence does not generally prevail, or the political condition of the country would really, instead of improving, or even being stationary, be in a continued, though perhaps slow, course of deterioration. Mankind are disposed, as they ought, to sacrifice much of their peace and quiet in the prospect of improvement. Many men find as much pleasure in forgetting the present for the sake of the future, as Sir Walter Scott does in dreaming of the past, while he shuts out the present age. The great novelist too, may remember, if he will stoop to facts, that though he lives "quietly and peaceably," and happily (not more happily than he merits) there are great multitudes of the people of these islands, who do not find their condition so unsusceptible of improvement.'

There is an inconsistency in Sir Walter's deprecations, which remains to be noticed. He admits that things "will be brought round in the government of the world," whatever miseries are produced by innovation. "The crop," he says, will come "in God Almighty's time." Now if the crop is God Almighty's, the seed must be his also. This is not bringing matters round; it is only realizing their intended consequences. We grant, that an evil may be supposed, which God turns to good, or at least hinders from producing more evil; but if a particular providence is brought into the question, who shall say what are the measures which it does or does not countenance; or what are those which can possibly be omitted in its contemplations? It is idle to bring the name of the great mystery of the universe into play, unless you follow the use of it into all its consequences. At all events, it is not likely, that the old saying of the Voice of the People being the Voice of God, will be changed in a hurry in favour of the divinity of the Voice of the Boroughmongers.

By the way, how does Sir Walter reconcile his horror of change with his Bible? If, while using the language of the Bible, he does not believe in it (which the dilemma of the argument allows us, for the sake of argument, to suppose) his use of it is unfair. If he does believe in it, then there is no men more bound to believe in innovations and popular changes than he; for in the Bible is to be found the doctrine of the Millenium, and the announcement of all those blissful prospects of peace and good-will, which, for endeavouring to get the smallest glimpse of, the philosophers are so strangely thwarted and sneered at by the orthodox! This is odd.

The Globe says, that an approbation of Reform was not to be expected from Sir Walter, because 'he was not only, by personal connections, bound up with the abuses of the present system, but his favourite studies have led him to look back instead of forward, and to value most in the present institutions and accidents of society, those which are most connected with the past, and least applicable to present use. We must not expect any affection for steam-engines or power-looms in a dealer in antiques.'

We subjoin, upon this point, the masterly observations of a great writer, lately deceased (Mr Hazlitt); who, in the course of a critical article on Sir Walter Scott, full of high and just panegyric upon him as a novelist, deplored the inconsistencies produced in his character by a Tory breeding:—

'Sir Walter Scott,' says Mr Hazlitt, 'is just half what the human intellect is capable of being: if you take the universe, and divide it into two parts, he knows all that it has been; all that it is to be is nothing to him. His is a mind brooding over antiquity—scorning "the present ignorant time." He is "laudator temporis acti"—a "prophesier of things past." The old world is to him a crowded map; the new one a dull, hateful blank. He dotes on all well-authenticated superstitions; he shudders at the shadow of innovation. His retentiveness of memory, his accumulated weight of interested prejudice or romantic association, have overlaid his other faculties. The cells of his memory are vast, various, full even to bursting with life and motion; his speculative understanding is empty, flaccid, poor, and dead. His mind receives and treasures up everything brought to it by tradition or custom—it does not project itself beyond this into the world unknown, but mechanically shrinks back as from the edge of a precipice. The land of pure reason is to his apprehension like Van Dieman's Land;—barren, miserable, distant, a place of exile, the dreary abode of savages, convicts, and adventurers. Sir Walter would make a bad hand of a description of the Millennium, unless he could lay the scene in Scotland five hundred years ago, and then he would want facts and worm-eaten parchments to support his drooping style. Our historical novelist firmly thinks that nothing is but what has been—that the moral world stands still, as the material one was supposed to do of old—and that we can never get beyond the point where we actually are without utter destruction, though everything changes and will change from what it was three hundred years ago to what it is now,—from what it is now to all that the bigoted admirer of the good old times most dreads and hates!'

Again, after an enthusiastic enumeration of the chief characters in Sir Walter's novels, Mr Hazlitt says of the author,—'Does he really think of making us enamoured of the "good old times" by the faithful and harrowing portraits he has drawn of them? Would he carry us back to the early stages of barbarism, of clanship, of the feudal system, as "a consummation devoutly to be wished?". Is he infatuated enough, or does he so dote and drivel over his own slothful and self-willed prejudices, as to believe that he will make a single convert to the beauty of Legitimacy, that is, of lawless power and savage bigotry, when he himself is obliged to apologise for the horrors he describes, and even render his descriptions credible to the modern reader by referring to the authentic history of these delectable times? He is indeed so besotted as to the moral of his own story, that he has even the blindness to go out of his way to have a fling at flints and dungs (the contemptible ingredients, as he would have us believe, of a modern rabble) at the very time when he is describing a mob of the twelfth century—a mob (one should think) after the writer's own heart, without one particle of modern philosophy or revolutionary politics in their composition, who were to a man, to a hair, just what priests, and kings, and nobles let them be, and who were collected to witness (a spectacle proper to the times) the burning of the lovely Rebecca at a stake for a sorceress, because she was a Jewess, beautiful and innocent, and the consequent victim of insane bigotry and unbridled profligacy. And it is at this moment (when the heart is kindled and bursting with indignation at the revolting abuses of self-constituted power) that Sir Walter stops the press to have a sneer at the people, and to put a spoke (as he thinks) in the wheel of upstart innovation! This is what he "calls backing his friends"—it is thus he administers charms and philtres to our love of Legitimacy, makes us conceive a horror of all reform, civil, political, or religious, and would fain put down the Spirit of the Age. The author of Waverley might just as well get up and make a speech at a dinner at Edinburgh, abusing Mr Mac-Adam for his improvements in the roads, on the ground that they were nearly impassable in many places "sixty years since;" or object to Mr Peel's Police-Bill, by insisting that Hounslow Heath was formerly a scene of greater interest and terror to highwaymen and travellers, and cut a greater figure in the Newgate-Calendar than it does at present.—Oh! Wickliff, Luther, Hampden, Sidney, Somers, mistaken Whigs, and thoughtless Reformers in religion and politics, and all ye, whether poets or philosophers, heroes or sages, inventors of arts or sciences, patriots, benefactors of the human race, enlighteners and civilisers of the world, who have (so far) reduced opinion to reason, and power to law, who are the cause that we no longer burn witches and heretics at slow fires, that the thumb-screws are no longer applied by ghastly, smiling judges, to extort confession of imputed crimes from sufferers for conscience sake; that men are no longer strung up like acorns on trees without judge or jury, or hunted like wild beasts through thickets and glens, who have abated the cruelty of priests, the pride of nobles, the divinity of kings in former times; to whom we owe it, that we no longer wear round our necks the collar of Gurth the swine-herd, and of Wamba the jester; that the castles of great lords are no longer the dens of banditti, from whence they issue with fire and sword, to lay waste the land; that we no longer expire in loathsome dungeons without knowing the cause, or have our right hands struck off for raising them in self-defence against wanton insult; that we can sleep without fear of being burnt in our beds, or travel without making our wills; that no Amy Robsarts are thrown down trap-doors by Richard Varneys with impunity; that no Red Reiver of Westburn Flat sets fire to peaceful cottages; that no Claverhouse signs cold-blooded death-warrants in sport; that we have no Tristan the Hermit, or Petit-André, crawling near us, like spiders, and making our flesh creep, and our hearts sicken within us at every moment of our lives—ye who have produced this change in the face of nature and society, return to earth once more, and beg pardon of Sir Walter and his patrons, who sigh at not being able to undo all that you have done!'

ERRATUM IN OUR YESTERDAY'S ARTICLE:—For "atom of the shadow," read "atom of a shadow."

THE PLAY-GOER.

OLYMPIC THEATRE.

AT the close of this theatre on Saturday night, the following Address was spoken by Madame VESTRIS:—

'LADIES AND GENTLEMEN,—The last night of our little season has already arrived, and I appear before you to say, farewell. At its commencement I had recourse to poetry in my address to you, the better to describe the hopes and fears which actuated me. Circumstances are now changed. I have tried, and I have succeeded. (Loud applause from all parts of the house). Fiction must, therefore, be laid aside; and truth, in its own honest prose, express the heartfelt gratitude of the first female lessee. Woman is said to be a contradiction. This I, for one, dare not deny; for I own I stand here a thoroughly contented manager. (Applause). We have done the best which the suddenness of the undertaking permitted, to deserve your support. We have produced various new pieces, some of which have been eminently successful—none of which have failed. We have introduced to you several new faces, whom three short months have served to convert into old friends. Thus much I may speak for the past—the future shall speak for itself. I leave you with the sincerest wishes of a grateful heart for your health and happiness until our next October Meeting; and when the gloom of winter shall again be on your heads, come to the Olympic, and it shall go hard but we will kindle a summer of merriment in your hearts. At all events, no exertion shall be spared on my part to win from you an admission that "the women are the best Managers after all." (Loud cheering). I have now only to offer you the sincere thanks of the Performers generally for the kind encouragement they have met with. Be assured they all feel as they ought. In fact, Ladies and Gentlemen, the heart of the establishment is full, and the head of the establishment is here to say so. As Fanny Bolton, the Captain of Grenadiers (placing her hand to her forehead) I salute my company in the pit. As Julian, the Page, I pay my respectful duty to the boxes; and as Pandora, I drop my curtesy to the gods.'—Madame Vestris then curtsied three times and retired, the audience giving her three rounds of applause.

CURIOSITIES OF LANGUAGE.

TO THE TATLER.

MR TATLER,—Being somewhat partial to philological research, I frequently amuse myself by considering the analogy of languages, and accordingly send you the following, which may not be unsuited to your pages:—

Perhaps the Italians used to fasten their doors at night by a chain, their word for bolt being "catenaccio," or the "great chain," an augmentative of "catena." In Portuguese it is "ferrolho," that is, "the great iron." Though watches could not have been invented in all countries, the European nations have not borrowed the name they give them from a foreign language.

Fr. Montre } a shower.
Sp. Muestra }
Ital. Oriulo, an hour instrument.
Ger. Uhr, an hour.

With the Germans, as with us, the clock "strikes" (schlagt) the hour, with the softer French (elle sonne) "it sounds" it, and with the Italians it simply (da l'ora) "gives the hour," although they sometimes use the word "suono," like the French.

With the Italians, the hat is referred to the head by name, "capello," diminutive of "capo," the head; with the Spaniards, it is "sombrero," a shader, from its shape.

Phrases signifying obligation or compulsion are amusingly different in various languages.

We must die.

Germ. Wer mussen sterben. We must die.
Lat. Moriendum est nobis. It is to us to die.
Fr. Il nous faut mourir. It to us is necessary to die.
Ital. Ce bisogna morire. To us it is necessary to die.
Span. Hemos de morir. We have to die.

In all these examples, the close affinity of the German with our own strong language, is very perceptible.

The different names assigned to the pocket-handkerchief are also pretty specimens of the curious construction of languages.

Fr. Mouchoir. The rheumer.
Ital. Fazzoletto. (From faccia, the face) the little face-cloth.
Span. Panuelo, panizuelo. The little cloth.
Germ. Schnupftuck. The rheumer, or wiper.

It is also curious to observe the different meaning a word acquires in the course of years. Thus, the word "knight," which formerly signified a "servant," is now applied as an honorary distinction. In German, it has the same meaning, "knecht." In most of the other European languages, the rank is implied by a term signifying a "horseman." Thus, in Spanish, it is "caballero;" in Portuguese, "caballeiro;" in Italian, "cavaliere," or "cavaliero;" in French, "chevalier." The Romans called it by the name of "eques," which has the same meaning.

PHILO-DRAMATICUS.

[Our correspondent would be amused in tracing the derivation of our commercial and counting-house terms from the Italians. It serves to throw an interesting light on old customs. Thus bankrupt is banco rotto, one who had his bench broken in the market-place; file is filo, a thread, still the counting-house file in Italy, &c.]

THE CHILDREN AND THE WATCH.

Among the Reformers whom Sir Walter Scott honours with the title of children, and who, he says, have got a watch in their hands which they are breaking, out of sheer ignorance, are to be found the green understandings of Lord Brougham, Lord Holland, Lord Lansdowne, Lord Plunkett, the Lord Advocate (Jeffrey), Sir James Mackintosh, and others of his Majesty's Ministry and Privy Council; and these unripe infants are encouraged in their sport by the innocent and rosy-cheeked companionship of Messrs Bentham, Bayley, Tooke, Mill, Romilly, Norman, Grote, sundry Smiths, Joneses, Thompsons, Evanses, and Napiers, &c. &c. besides the Editors of the best newspapers, and of almost all the periodicals.

On the other hand, let us see who are to be found among Sir Walter's men,—among those masculine understandings which are distinguished by their opposition to these childish ones,—beings of a gigantic reach of intellect, and who impress everybody with a profound sense of it. There is Sir Charles Wetherell and Sergeant Best, and the Duke of Newcastle, and the Duke of Wellington (the "mad Minister," as he predicated himself), and Lord Londonderry (a gentleman who does not even know what a nurse is, so long has he outlived the sallies of his childhood), and Mr Perceval (who proposes that hungry men should fast), and Mr Goulbourn, and Mr Bankes, and Sir Robert Inglis, and Mr Alderman Atkins, and Sir James Scarlett (the happiest of calculators), and Mr Attwood, and Mr Sumner (who throws ink-stands); and my Lord Rolle the grammarian, and the experienced Mr Praed, and candid Peel, and comfortable Sugden, and the estimable solidity of John Wilson Croker, and the profound Duke of Gloucester, and the perfect Duke of Cumberland.

If a Roman Senate ever beat these, we will be hanged. A single Sir Charles Wetherell would have sufficed to make the Gaul retreat. There is no puerility here, no childishness either of feeling or understanding; no takers of virtue for granted; or believers even in such a thing as change; no breakers of watches out of ignorance, or of heads, or even of Priscian's head. They have all arrived at man's estate, some of them at a great many other men's estates; and their faculties are in such perfection, that nothing can stand before them. Sir Charles Wetherell carries it hollow in the Lower House, and in the Upper, the Lord Chancellor, though allowed to be a precocious young gentleman, has nothing to say for himself. Best, Londonderry, and Wellington, all make him feel his insignificance. He is the little boy, and they the great men.

"By plain heroic magnitude of mind;"

All this is clear as "the sun at noon-day." The childhood of the reformers we allow, and their incompetence to be watchmen; but still there is one thing in Sir Walter's simile puzzles us. He accuses these children of spoiling the watch by putting the regulator "backwards and forwards." Now their putting it forwards may be conceded, but how have they attempted to put it backwards? We fear it is the unaccountable elders that have been doing this, and that the sole movements which constitute the dangerous part of the counteraction, are theirs. The Reformers are simply for putting the regulator onward, because time has advanced; it is the anti-Reformers who are for putting it backward; arguing, with inconceivable strangeness, that no true hands of a watch are intended to advance with time, but always to remain at one hour;—if at the hour of midnight, so much the better. Our fathers slept happily at that hour, argues Sir Walter, and therefore why should we ever wake? It is a very pretty "witching time of night;" and for my part, I sleep as warm as can be. What signifies how they sleep in Ireland, or in Kent or Sussex; or in brick-kilns, or at street-doors, or on London Bridge, or without a supper, or after the deaths of three children? It is very well with Clerks of Session, I assure you; and being well with them, it must be well with everybody. If a Clerk of Session is well fed, it shows that the people are all happy in Gloucestershire.

THE POPE AND THE EMPEROR FREDERIC.

'A far heavier calamity than the rout of his fleet had now humbled the arrogance of Frederic, and so totally had he been defeated by the Milanese at Legnano, that many days elapsed after the battle before it was ascertained that he still lived. Humbled on all sides, he no longer refused to treat, and it was resolved that conferences should be opened in Venice, for the adjustment of the claims of the Lombard cities, and the settlement of the Pontificate. The result was a truce for six years with the former, and the acknowledgment of Alexander as Pope. To add solemnity to this treaty, Frederic expressed a wish that he might ratify it in person; but, while he remained under excommunication, it was a mortal sin in any one to hold communion with him. The Pope freed the Venetians from the spiritual difficulties, by removing the anathema; and on the 24th of June, the Emperor landed on the Piazzett of St Mark. The Doge, attended by his train of State, his Councils, the Senate, and all the other members of his Court and Government, received him on his disembarkation, and escorted him to the gates of the Cathedral. There, surrounded by the imposing splendour of ecclesiastical pomp, clothed in Pontifical vestments, the triple crown glittering on his brow, himself alone seated, amid a brilliant throng of Cardinals, Prelates, and Ambassadors, who stood around, Alexander, severely tranquil, awaited the approach of his no longer formidable enemy. The Emperor, as he drew near, uncovered his head, cast aside his purple mantle, and, prostrating himself, before the Holy Father's throne, crept onward that he might kiss his feet. The wrongs of twenty years flashed across the remembrance of the Pope. He had been hunted like a partridge on the mountains; unthroned, dishonoured, exiled, proscribed, a price set upon his very life; and the persecutor, from whose impious violence he considered himself to have been shielded by that especial Providence which watched over his sacred office, was now humbled beneath him in the dust. He may be forgiven, if, in a moment so trying to self-restraint, he was unable to suppress his strong feeling of exultation. Planting his foot on the neck of the prostrate Emperor, he repeated the words of David, "Thou shalt go upon the lion and the adder, and the young lion and the dragon shalt thou tread under thy feet!" "It is not to you, it is to St Peter!" murmured the indignant Prince; and the reply cost him a yet further humiliation. Alexander trod a second time more firmly upon his neck, exclaiming, "It is both to me, and to St Peter!" A square stone of red marble in the vestibule of St Mark's, still denotes the spot on which this singular and memorable reconciliation took place. On quitting the Cathedral, the Emperor conducted Alexander to his horse, assisted him to mount, and held his stirrup. He would even have waited on his bridle, and have performed the lowly duties of an Esquire, but the good taste or the satiety of the Holy Father forbad these further marks of subjection.

'It would have been an easy task to follow the customary track in relating the above narrative; to have declaimed against the haughty bearing, as it is termed, of the Pontiff; and to have placed, in strong contrast with his pride, the meekness and humility of that Heavenly Master whom he professed to represent on earth. But are such pictures just? The pride, if we are so pleased to term it, of Alexander, was not a low and petty feeling, which regarded his own individual aggrandizement, but it sprang from a contemplation of the holy guardianship with which he had been invested. He believed (fervently, sincerely believed) that he was the Vicar of his Saviour; and, that by the injuries he had endured in his own person, that Saviour had been injured also. It is not the reasonableness, nor the truth of this belief, that is now advocated; but if the motive once be granted (and there seems no other which could have supported Alexander, unbroken and undismayed, through the long struggle of his persecution) the acts which flowed from that motive will be divested of much of the insidiousness which has sometimes been imputed to them. His first address to Frederic was couched in the words of Scripture, and spoken as by one endued with the delegated authority of Christ; nor was it till the oppressor attempted to separate the Man from the Pontiff that he indignantly repulsed this infringement upon his rights, and identified himself with the Apostle.'—P. 74.

We see little subtlety in this refinement. Men, whatever their creed is, generally act upon that part of it (if it has one) which enables them to indulge their real temper. The Pope found something in his, which enabled him to exult over his enemy; and he did so.

EXTRACTS FROM NEW BOOKS.

FIELD-MARSHAL COUNT DIEBITSCH.

'The fifth corps of the Russian army, seven thousand strong, marched from their encampment for Russia. Previous to their departure, a Te Deum was performed. The troops were formed into a large hollow square, open at each of the angles. In the centre were the priests in their full canonical robes, an officiating choir of soldiers, and all the general and principal staff officers. The heads of the whole assembly were uncovered. The appearance of the priests, with their oriental costume, their long hair and flowing beards, like the prophets of old, was remarkably striking. The chanting was extremely melodious. The principal priest, six feet five inches high, was an exceedingly handsome man: his light hair was parted on the forehead, and allowed to hang down his shoulders; his long beard rested upon a kind of ephod, or breast-plate, upon which was emblazoned a golden cross. The voice of the singers harmonized like the notes of a finely-toned organ. After this service, a large metal or silver bowl, full of water, was carried round the square, into which the principal priests dipped a brush, and with it besprinkled the soldiers as they passed. The most conspicuous actor in this performance was Field-Marshal Diebitsch, who, though a Protestant by profession, vied with the most devout in the crossings, besprinklings, and genuflexions. The contrast between his appearance and that of the principal priest was highly ludicrous, he being as much below, as the priest is above, the common height. But the little field-marshal is too great a man not to call forth a more particular description of his personal appearance; more especially so, because, like the milk-maid in the nursery-song, though in a very opposite sense, his "face" may be said to have been "his fortune." Field-marshal Count Diebitsch is a little, fat, plethoric-looking man, something less than five feet high; he has a very large head, with long black hair, small piercing eyes, and a complexion of the deepest scarlet, alike expressive of his devotion to cold punch, and of a certain irascibility of temper, which has elicited from the troops, to his proud title of Zabalcansky (or the Trans-Balcanian) the additional one of the Semavar (or the tea-kettle). I have said that Count Diebitsch owes his title to his face; the sequel will show how. He is the second son of a Prussian officer who was on the staff of Frederic. At an early age he entered the Russian army, and obtained a company in the imperial guard. It was at this time that the King of Prussia came on a visit to the Russian autocrat, and it so happened that it was Captain Diebitsch's tour of duty to mount guard on the royal visitor. The Emperor foresaw the ridiculous figure the little captain would cut at the head of the tall grenadiers, and desired a friend delicately to hint to him that it would be agreeable to his imperial master, if he would resign the guard to a brother officer. Away goes the friend, meets the little captain, and bluntly tells him that the Emperor wishes him not to mount guard with his company; for, adds he, "L'Empereur dit, et il faut convenir, que vous avez l'extérieur terrible." This "delicate hint" that his exterior was too terrible to be seen at the head of the troops not remarkable for good looks, so irritated the future hero of the Balcan, that, with his natural warmth of temper, he begged to resign, not his tour of duty only, but the commission he held in the Russian army; and being a Prussian, and not a Russian subject, desired to be allowed to return to his native country. The Emperor Alexander, who appears to have formed a just estimate of his talents, easily found means to pacify him, by giving him promotion in the line. He has subsequently made himself so useful in that part of the service, where beauty was not indispensable, that the late Emperor placed him at the head of the general staff, which situation he held when the reigning Emperor appointed him to succeed Count Wittgenstein in the chief command. * * * * * * * When the last religious rite was performed, the field-marshal and his staff mounted their horses, and the former, coming forward, addressed a few words to the soldiers, who received the order from their leaders to shout applause. They obeyed it, as they would any other command; a faint cheer issued from their lips, while the rest of their immovable features seemed, as they ever do, utter strangers to the relaxation of a smile. The troops now filed off, and marched past the field-marshal, on their road to Selimno. Their progress was enlivened by the vocal bands for which the Russian armies are so famous. The regiments were scarcely seven hundred strong: their full complement is three thousand; but plague, disease, famine, and the sword, had reduced them to their present numbers. —Keppell's Narrative of a Journey across the Balcan.

TREATMENT OF WOMEN.

In most uncivilized countries, women are treated more or less as slaves, but there is a great difference in this respect. One thing observable is, that in proportion to the kind treatment of the women is their gentleness or goodness of disposition in general. Captain Beechey, in his Voyage to the Pacific, speaks continually of the dishonesty and treachery of the natives of the islands at which he touched. Of one island only, the Lagoon Island, discovered by Captain Cook, he tells us that "strict integrity was observed in all their dealings." These people treated the women well; "they were inferior to the men in personal appearance, and mostly bow-legged; but they exerted an authority not very common among uncivilised people, by taking from the men whatever articles they received in exchange for their fruit, as soon as they returned to the shore. The good-natured countenances of these people, the honesty observed in all their dealings, and the great respect they paid their women, bespeak them a more amiable race than the avaricious Gambier Islanders." A few days after this, the vessel touched at Bow Island; of the natives of which, Captain Beechey says, "The superiority of sex was never more rigidly enforced than among these barbarians, nor were the male part of the human species ever more despicable."—"In no part of the world," says the author, in another passage; "are they (the women) treated more brutally. While their husbands are indulging their lethargic dispositions under the shade of the cocoa-nut trees, making no effort toward their own support, beyond that of eating when their food is placed before them, the women are sent to the reefs to wade over the sharp-pointed coral in search of shell-fish, or to the woods to collect pandanus-nuts. We have seen them going out at daylight on these pursuits, and returning quite fatigued with their morning toil. In this state, instead of enjoying a little repose on reaching their home, they are engaged in the laborious occupation of preparing what they have gathered for their hungry masters, who, immediately the nuts are placed before them, stay their appetites by extracting the pulpy substance contained in the outside woody fibres of the fruit, and throw the remainder to their wives, who further extract what is left of the pulp, for their own share, and then proceed to extricate the contents of the interior, consisting of four or five small kernels about the size of an almond." These kernels are carefully preserved for the men. "On one occasion, an unfortunate woman, who was pounding some of these nuts, which she had walked a great distance to gather, thinking herself unobserved, ate two or three kernels as she extracted them; but this did not escape the vigilance of her brutal husband, who instantly rose and felled her to the ground, in the most inhuman manner, with three violent blows of his fist."—Beechey's Narrative of a Voyage to the Pacific.

THE FRENCH LILY.

'The Count W. had commissioned his brother, who resided at Moscow, to look out for some Frenchman who was competent to undertake the education of the Count's two sons, and to enter into the necessary arrangement with him for that purpose. A Frenchman of good appearance was selected from a great number of candidates, and was soon after despatched to Raginou. Things went on satisfactorily for some time, and the Count applauded the choice that his brother had made for him. One day a servant of the Count, who had been appointed to attend exclusively on the French tutor, accidentally observed that the latter had the mark of a lily printed on one of his shoulders. Astonished at a novelty so unaccountable, he ventured to question the Frenchman, who, taken by surprise, and probably not knowing exactly what explanation to give, told the servant, in great secrecy, that he was a member of the family of the Bourbons, who, after the revolution, had all agreed on printing that royal mark upon their persons, that it might always serve as a sign of recognition among themselves in any part of the world where their misfortunes might happen to lead them. Notwithstanding his promise to keep the matter secret, the servant, as may easily be imagined, hastened to inform every one of his fellow-domestics of his luck in having to attend on a person of royal blood. This soon came to the ears of the whole family, and from that moment he was treated by all with an obsequiousness and respect which almost placed the whole establishment at his command. Ill luck would have it, however, that one day a French emigrant, holding a distinguished rank in the Russian service, being on his way to Cazan, stopped at Raginou to spend a day with Count W. The latter hasted to inform his visitor of the illustrious personage who resided in his house. "But," said the traveller, "are you quite sure it is so?"—"Nothing more certain," replied the Count. "I have seen it, I have touched it, and so has almost everybody in the house."—"But what have you seen? Is it documents, parchments, or certificates?"—"Not at all," said the Count; "it is something infinitely surer than all that—nothing less than the mark of the fleur-de-lis printed on his shoulder!"—The astonishment of the traveller may be easily guessed, on learning this evidence of the tutor's pretensions to royalty; but when it was explained to the Count that it was the brand of a criminal, his indignation knew no bounds. The royal preceptor did not long remain under the Count's roof after the discovery of this impudent imposture.'—Journal of a Nobleman.

THE LIKINGS AND ANTIPATHIES OF DOGS.

'It is well-known that dogs will take likings, or dislikes to particular individuals, for no understood cause. It is said that they generally object to beggars or shabbily dressed persons, considering them suspicious characters; but to say nothing of the association of ideas which this implies,—far beyond what they are generally supposed to possess;—this illiberal opinion of poverty, and harshness towards the poor, looks more human than canine; and it is very certain that many a poor blind beggar has found in his dog a faithful friend and servant, and that wealthy individuals have been compelled to fly before the angry quadruped, of which they consider themselves the lords and masters. In Captain Beechey's Voyage to the Pacific, we find a curious instance of the different disposition of a Newfoundland dog, towards the natives of two neighbouring islands, none of whom were likely to influence the animal, by any magnificence of apparel, or imposing show of wealth. The Captain stopped at the largest of Gambier's Islands, and many of the natives crowded on the decks of his ship, curiously examining everything, and making off with such small articles as they could secrete without detection. —"They were pleased with many articles that were shewn them; but nothing made them so completely happy as the sight of two dogs that we had on board. The largest of these, of the Newfoundland breed, was big and surly enough to take care of himself; but the other, a terrier, was snatched up by one of the natives, and was so much the object of his solicitation, that it was only by force he was prevented carrying him away. To people who had never seen any quadruped before but a rat, so large an animal as a Newfoundland dog, and that perfectly domesticated and obedient to his master, natually excited intense curiosity, and the great desire of these people to possess themselves of it, is not to be wondered at. Had there been a female dog on board, they certainly should have had them both; but one would have been of no use, except, probably, to furnish a meal, which is the fate of all the rats they can catch." In the course of the same day, the Captain visited another island, but had no intercourse with the natives until the next morning, when the decks were again crowded. The numbers of visitors made it very difficult to guard the property, and the detection and pursuit of a thief having frightened them from the vessel for a few minutes, the Captain wished to prevent their return to the decks, and placed a marine at each of the ladders.—"But as the natives tried every method to elude their vigilance, the sentinels had an arduous task to perform, and disturbances must inevitably have arisen in the execution of their orders, had it not have been for our Newfoundland dog. It fortunately happened that this animal had taken a dislike to our visitors, and the deck being cleared, he instinctively placed himself at the foot of the ladder, and in conjunction with the little terrier, who did not forget his perilous hug of the day before, most effectually accomplished our wishes. The natives, who had never seen a dog before, were in the greatest terror of them; and Neptune's bark was soon found to be far more efficacious than the point of a sentry's bayonet, and much less likely to lead to serious disturbances. Besides, his activity cleared the main deck at once, and supplied the place of all the sentinels. The natives applied the name of boa to him, a word which, in the Otaheitan language, properly signifies a hog. But it may be observed that boa is applied equally to a bull or to a horse, which they (the Otaheitans) call boa-afae-taata (literally man-carrying pig) or to all foreign quadrupeds." These people, however, who had seen no quadrupeds but rats, could not associate the dog with the horse, the bull, or the hog, and probably understood by the word boa, simply a quadruped.'

THE GROWTH OF THE LOBSTER.

'The lobster still continuing to increase, while its shell remains unalterably the same, the animal becomes too large for its habitation, and imprisoned within the crust that has naturally gathered round it, there comes on a necessity of getting free. The young of this kind, therefore, that grow faster, as we are assured by the fishermen, change their shell oftener than the old, who, come to their full growth, remain in the shell often for two years together. In general, however, these animals change their shells once a year, and this is not only a most painful operation, but also subjects them to every danger. Just before casting its shell, it throws itself upon its back, strikes its claws upon each other, and every limb seems to tremble; its feelers are agitated, and the whole body is in violent motion; it then swells itself in an unusual manner, and at last the shell is seen beginning to divide at its junctures. It also seems turned inside out; and its stomach comes away with its shell. After this, by the same operation, it disengages itself of the claws, which burst at the joints; the animal, with a tremulous motion, casting them off, as a man would kick off a boot that was too big for him. Thus, in a short time, this wonderful creature finds itself at liberty; but in such a weak and enfeebled state, that it continues for several hours motionless. Indeed, so violent and painful is the operation, that many of them die under it, and those which survive, are in such a weakly state for some time, that they neither take food nor venture from their retreats. Immediately after this change, they have not only the softness, but the timidity of a worm. Every animal of the deep is then a powerful enemy, which they can neither escape nor oppose; and this, in fact, is the time when the dog-fish, the cod, and the ray, devour them by hundreds. But this state of defenceless imbecility continues for a very short time, the animal, in less than two days, is seen to have the skin that covered its body grown as hard as before; its appetite is seen to increase; and, strange to behold! the first object that tempts its gluttony, is its own stomach, which it so lately was disengaged from. This it devours with great eagerness; and, some time after, eats even its former shell. In about forty-eight hours, in proportion to the animal's health and strength, the new shell is perfectly formed, and as hard as that which was but just thrown aside. * * * * The creature thus furnished, not only with a complete covering, but also a greater share of strength and courage, ventures more boldly among the animals at the bottom; and not a week passes that in its combats it does not suffer some mutilation. A joint, or even a whole claw, is sometimes snapped off in these encounters. At certain times of the year, these animals never meet each other without an engagement. In these, to come off with the loss of a leg, or even a claw, is considered as no great calamity, the victor carries off the spoil to feast upon at his leisure, while the other retires from the defeat to wait for a thorough repair. This repair he is not long in procuring. From the place where the joint of the claw was cut away, is seen in a most surprising manner to bourgeon out the beginning of a new claw. This, if observed, at first, is small and tender, but grows in the space of three weeks, to be almost as large and as powerful as the old one. We say almost as large, for it never arrives to the full size; and this is the reason we generally find the claws of lobsters of unequal magnitude.'—A natural History, drawn from the writings of Buffon, &c.—[It is really not a little surprising that naturalists should have gained so much knowledge of the habits of fish in general, but zeal can effect many things, that appear at first view almost impossible. Still, it would be pleasant enough to know how the author learned that the lobster considered the loss of a leg or claw as "no great calamity." Bingley says that "the notion of lobsters losing their claws at thunder-claps, or the sound of cannon, is well authenticated;" and that the fishermen are often jestingly threatend with a salute, by the sailors.]

THE GROWTH OF FISHES.

'The fishermen assure us that sea-fish is not fit to be served up to table until it is six years old. They instance it in the growth of a mackarel: those of a year old, are as large as one's finger; those of two years are about twice that length; at three and four years, they are that small kind of mackarel that have neither milts nor roes; and between five and six, they are those full grown fish that are served up to our tables. In the same manner, with regard to flat fishes, they tell us that the turbot and plaice at one year, are about the size of a crown piece; the second year, as large as the palm of one's hand; and, at the fifth and sixth year, they are large enough to be served up to table. Thus it appears, that fishes are a considerable time in coming to their full growth.'—The same.

CATCHING ELECTRIC EELS.

'M. Humboldt gives an interesting account of the manner in which they catch these creatures, by what they call fishing with horses. After having scoured the savannah, and caught about thirty wild horses and mules, they drove them into the pool in which were the electric eels. The extraordinary noise caused by the horses' hoofs makes the fish issue from the mud, and excites them to combat. These yellowish and livid eels, resembling large aquatic serpents, swim on the surface of the water, and crowd under the bellies of the horses and mules. A contest between animals of so different an organization furnishes a very striking spectacle. The Indians, provided with harpoons and long slender reeds, surround the pool closely; and some climb upon the trees, the branches of which extend horizontally over the surface of the water. By their wild cries and the length of their reeds they prevent the horses from running away and reaching the bank of the pool. The eels, stunned by the noise, defend themselves by the repeated discharge of their electric batteries. During a long time they seem to prove victorious. Several horses sink beneath the violence of the invisible strokes which they receive from all sides in organs the most essential to life, and, stunned by the force and frequency of the shocks, disappear under the water. Others panting, with mane erect and haggard eyes expressing anguish, raise themselves, and endeavour to flee from the storm by which they are overtaken. They are driven back by the Indians into the middle of the water; but a small number succeed in eluding the active vigilance of the fishermen. These regain the shore, stumbling at every step, and stretch themselves on the sand, exhausted with fatigue, and their limbs benumbed by the electric shocks of the eels. In less than five minutes two horses were drowned. The eel being five feet long, and pressing itself against the belly of the horse, makes a discharge along the whole extent of its electric organ. It attacks at once the heart, the intestines, and the plexus cœliacus of abdominal nerves. It is natural that the effect felt by the horses should be more powerful than that produced upon man by the touch of the same fish at only one end of his extremities. The horses are probably not killed, but only stunned. They are drowned from the impossibility of rising amid the prolonged struggle between the other horses and the eels. We had little doubt that the fishing would terminate by killing successively all the animals engaged; but by degrees the impetuosity of this unequal contest diminished, and the wearied eels dispersed. They require a long rest, and abundant nourishment, to repair what they have lost of galvanic force. The mules and horses appear less frightened; their manes are no longer bristled, and their eyes express less dread. The eels timidly approach the edge of the marsh, where they are taken by means of small harpoons fastened to long cords. When the cords are very dry, the Indians feel no shock on raising the fish into the air. In a few minutes we had five large eels, the greater part of which were but slightly wounded.—The same.

THE FISHERMAN'S DEPUTIES.

'The Remora, or Sucking-fish, has the power of adhering to whatever it sticks against, in the same manner as a cupping-glass sticks to the human body.  They are often seen adhering to the sides of ships, and to the bodies of sharks and other large fish. This adhesive quality gave rise to an absurd belief among the ancients, that the possessor of it had the power of arresting the progress of a ship in its fastest sailing. The Indians of Cuba and Jamaica formerly used to turn this quaity to account by keeping tame Remoras, with which they fished. The Remora was secured by a slender but strong line, to which was attached a buoy, and was thrown into the water, upon which it would immediately pursue and fasten upon any fish that it perceived.—A Natural History, drawn from Buffon, &c.—[In China the fishermen are assisted in their labours by a bird, called the Cormorant, which they train up for the purpose, as was formerly the practice in England. Some men employ great numbers of these birds, taking the precaution of tying a leathern band round the neck of each, to prevent their swallowing their prey. They dive into the water, and when they have caught a fish, faithfully deliver it up to their master. It is said that if they seize upon a fish too large for the strength of one bird, another will assist, and, that one carrying it by the head and another by the tail, they, in this manner, convey it to the boat. When the birds have done their duty, their collars are removed, and they are permitted to supply themselves. There was formerly, and as late as the reign of Charles the First, an officer of the royal household, in England, who bore the title of Master of the Cormorants. As the birds are not very numerous in this country, it was found, perhaps, easier to catch the fish than them. There is a story told somewhere, of a gentleman, who had an eagle as his caterer, and who, instead of sending to the poulterer's or the butcher's, sent regularly to a nest upon the cliffs, for the daily fare of his family.]

CHANGE OF RESIDENCE.

'The Hermit or Soldier Crab has no shell to any part except its nippers; but what Nature has denied this animal, it supplies by art; and taking possession of the deserted shell of some other animal, it resides in it, till, by growing too large for its habitation, it is under a necessity of change. * * * * It is very diverting to observe these crabs when changing the shell. The little soldier is seen busily parading the shore along that line of pebbles and shells which is formed by the extremest wave, still, however, dragging its old incommodious habitation at its tail, unwilling to part with one shell, even though a troublesome appendage, until it can find one more convenient. It is seen stopping at one shell, turning it, and passing it by; going on to another, contemplating that for awhile, and then slipping its tail from the old habitation, to try on the new; this also is found to be inconvenient, and it quickly returns to its old shell again. In this manner it frequently changes, till at last it finds one light, roomy, and commodious; to this it adheres, though the shell be sometimes so large as to hide the body of the animal, claws and all. Yet it is not only till after many trials, but many combats also, that the Soldier is completely equipped; for there is often a contest between two of them for some well-looking favourite shell for which they are rivals. They both endeavour to take possession: they strike with their claws, they bite each other, till the weakest is obliged to yield, by giving up the object of dispute. It is then that the victor immediately takes possession, and parades in his new conquest three or four times backward and forward upon the strand, before his envious antagonist.'—The same.

RATHER AN ODD STORY.

'Gesner assures us, that it (the nightingale) is not only the most agreeable songster in a cage, but that it is possessed of a most admirable faculty of talking, He tells the following rather doubtful story, in proof of his assertion, which he says was communicated to him by a friend. "Whilst I was at Ratisbon," says his correspondent, "I put up at an inn, the sign of the Golden Crown, where my host had three nightingales. * * * * * It was usual, about midnight, to hear the two nightingales jangling and talking with each other, and plainly imitating men's discourses. Besides repeating the daily discourse of the guests, they chaunted out two stories. One of their stories was concerning the tapster and his wife, who refused to follow him to the wars, as he desired her; for the husband endeavoured to persuade his wife, as for as I understood by the birds, that he would leave his service at an inn, and go to the wars in hopes of plunder. But she refused to follow him, resolving to stay either at Ratisbon, or go to Nuremberg. There was a long and earnest contention between them; and all this dialogue the birds repeated. They even repeated the unseemly words which were cast out between them, and which ought rather to have been suppressed and kept a secret. The other story was concerning the war which the Emperor was then threatening against the Protestants; which the birds probably heard from some of the generals that had conferences in the house. These things did they repeat in the night after twelve o'clock, when there was a deep silence. But, in the day time, for the most part they were silent, and seemed to do nothing but meditate and revolve with themselves upon what the guests conferred upon together, as they sat at table, or in their walks.'—The same.

THE TENDER HEARTED WHALE.

'The fidelity of these animals (whales) to each other, exceeds whatever we are told of even the constancy of birds. Some fishers, as Anderson informs us, having struck one of two whales, a male or a female, that were in company together, the wounded fish made a long and terrible resistance; it struck down a boat with three men in it, by a single blow of the tail, by which all went to the bottom. The other still attended its companion, and lent it every assistance, till, at last, the fish that was struck, sunk under the number of its wounds; while its faithful associate, disdaining to survive the loss, with great bellowing, stretched itself upon the dead fish, and shared its fate.'—The same.

FECUNDITY OF FISH.

'A single cod produces, at a birth, two-thirds as many young ones as there are inhabitants in all Great Britain, above nine millions. The flounder produces more than a million at a birth; and the mackarel, five hundred thousand. * * * * A single herring, if suffered to multiply unmolested and undiminished for twenty years, would show a progeny greater in bulk than ten such globes as that we live upon.'—A Natural History, drawn from the writings of Buffon, &c.

LONGEVITY OF THE PIKE.

'Gesner relates that in the year 1497, a pike was taken near Hailbrun, in Suabia, with a brazen ring affixed to it, on which were these words in Greek characters: "I am the fish which was first of all put into this lake, by the hands of the Governor of the Universe, Frederic the Second, the fifth of October 1230."'

THE "AMENDE HONORABLE."

'This was an ignominious punishment, termed "honorable" on account of its being inflicted only on persons of high rank. The offender was led through the streets, bare-headed and bare-footed, with a burning link in his hands, to the seat of justice, or some other public place, where he confessed his offences, and begged forgiveness of the injured party.—Cotgrave.—The celebrated financier, Jacques Cœur, according to Monstrelet, was condemned to make the amende honorable to the King, by the proxy of his attorney, "bare-headed and ungirdled, having a lighted link of ten pounds weight in his hand; and he was to declare that he had falsely, disloyally, &c." The Damsel of Mortiagne suffered the same ignominy, in the person of her attorney.'—The hint is submitted to the reformers of our criminal code.'—Notes to Leitch Ritchie's Romance of History.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

The Romance of History. France. By Leitch Ritchie. Second Edition. In 3 vols. 8vo. Bull.

THESE volumes have fairly seduced us out of our plan of never taking any notice of novels or tales; nor do we now mean to depart from that plan, unless the temptation be strong, and the matter easily available for extracting. It is not that we have a dislike to novels. On the contrary, we are so fond of them, that we do not believe anybody could give a better account at a moment's notice of the contents of the novel department in the commonest catalogue of a circulating library. To say nothing of the writers who have been gathered into collections, we know well Mr Lane, and Mr Latham, and Mr Walker, and Mr Pickersgill, and Mr Sicklemore, and Mr Horsley Curteis, and Miss Minifie, and Miss Gunning, and Mrs Meeke, and Mrs Parsons, and Mrs Helme, and Mrs Bennett, and Mrs Hunter, and Mrs West, and Miss Burney, and Mrs Roche, and our beloved slip-slop Anne of Swansea, who writes like an inspired lady's-maid, and the authoress or the author of Morgiana (very clever), and the Adventures of Monsieur de Brinboc, which looked like the first essay of Sir Walter Scott. And very pretty pickings too might be got out of these names; sometimes in spite of grammar itself, and of all sorts of mistakes: for whatever has been said against the novels of circulating libraries, and of the undoubted trash to be found among them, we maintain upon the whole, that the flow of popular fiction for the last forty years has been highly creditable, both to the generation that swallowed, and the writers that produced it. But till our little journal be larger, (which we hope it will be), and warrant us in procuring assistance, we cannot pretend to criticize novels in general, because it is neither so easy to make a speedy judgment of their contents, as it is with works not fictitious, nor do they present such ready and extractable passages, entire in themselves. On the present occasion we have been seduced into an exception from our rule, partly by the historical foundation of the stories, partly by their shortness compared with novels, but chiefly by the hold which they took upon us, and by certain sympathies of the idem velle atque nolle which we flatter ourselves we discern in the author.

Our readers perhaps will not ask, after this, why we notice a work for the first time, which has been criticised, months ago, in other journals. A new edition gives a right to criticize any book; and, besides, we cannot help it; and so there's an end.

We remember a criticism in our contemporary, The Spectator, in which Mr Leitch Ritchie's name was pleasantly compared to the sound of the chirruping of birds. The least and most playful bit of truth makes an impression upon us; but till we became acquainted with this author's writings, we did not expect that this agreeable fancy would have been corroborated by the many other pleasant impressions which we have received from the work before us, and which have associated the author in our minds, with other vernal ideas of youth and beauty. We conclude Mr Ritchie to be, if not young, youngish; otherwise he surely would have been heard of before. If he is not older than we take him to be, he has singularly retained some of the faults, as well as beauties, of early genius. At all events he must have lived long enough to have observed a great deal; a delicate insight into human nature being one of the characteristics of his writings, no less than a certain exuberance of style sometimes, and a very graceful and cordial sympathy with the beautiful, always. Mr Ritchie, furthermore, is a scholar and a man of reading: one who reads history in a right spirit; who has profited by Voltaire, without being blind to his defects; and while admiring the autumnal colours of the past, has faith in the spring to come, and thinks even the winter may be improved to the shivering part of his species. He has been called the Sir Walter Scott of the brief story. The compliment is a great one, but it is deserved; and doubtless he values it as he ought. But in what we have just alluded to, Mr Ritchie has an advantage over Sir Walter: and he has one other, very acceptable in our eyes, and very desirable, we think, by all;—his females are pleasanter. He has a faith in womanhood, which Sir Walter has not. He does not think it necessary to tie and bind up his heroines in so many formalities; and we think he is right, not only on the side of the agreeable, but the prudent. He has not the wide range at present, of Sir Walter's knowledge. Perhaps he never will. Perhaps there are sore places in humanity into which he will never desire to look, further than with a wish to heal them. His inclinations, though leaning to the true, incline him to pass more hours than his great countryman, into the beautiful; but as beauty, in a high philosophical sense, is truth, and the identity promises to be more acknowledged every day, we are glad of this leaning in our author to the brighter side, not only on his own account, but because it helps to realize what it loves, for the world. We must observe, that Mr Ritchie sometimes draws a little too hard upon his probabilities; which is a pity, especially when we consider the accuracy of his historical painting, and the pains he has taken to corroborate it by his scholarship. If in his next work (for we take it for granted he must write more of the same sort) he would prune his epithets a little, restrain somewhat his inclination for dramatic surprise (which has but a melo-dramatic air with one or two of his pieces) and resolve to have nothing in any part of a narrative, unworthy of the rest (we mean in point of nature and likelihood), he will write stories as complete as charming, and be numbered among the happiest contributors to our stock of fiction.

We have read all Mr Ritchie's stories but the 'Phantom Fight,' the 'Dream Girl,' and the 'Lottery of Jewels.' These are pleasures we have to come. Our favourites at present are, the 'Serf,' the 'Pilgrim of St James,' the 'Bondsman's Feast,' the 'Magic Wand,' and the 'Rock of the Fort,'—all in the second and third volumes. The whole of the first volume appears to be young writing, compared with these. The 'Man-Wolf,' the 'Adventures of Eriland, and the 'King of the Beggars,' are too forced in some of their incidents. The 'King of the Beggars,' in particular, has what we mean by a melo-dramatic air; though we like the goblin "ho, ho!" of the hero too, and relish his approbation of the jewels.

We are puzzled what extract to give. Nay, upon reflection, we are not puzzled, for unquestionably the history of the cliff-scaling in the 'Rock of the Fort' must be our first extract. It is one of the most suspending stories we ever read, and in the middle of it fairly made our legs ache, out of sympathy with the men on the rope. It is the account of a set of seamen and their officer, scaling a cliff six hundred feet high, for the purpose of getting into a town by stratagem. The rope is fastened for them above by the officer's mistress, to "an old wheel which had been used in weighing stones for the repair of the ramparts;" and the officer is telling the story to the gallant Henri Quatre and the fair Gabrielle. The interest, at the point where poor André says he can climb no further, is surely intense.

'We remained, I think,' says Captain Boisrosé, 'for upwards of an hour, before we saw that the rope was nearly all spun out. At length, the hoisting ceased; the labour of Monique was at a close; and we lashed the cable's end securely to the boat. All things went bravely on; we had hit our time to a minute; the sky was covered with a pall, the ends of which seemed to hang far over the horizon of the earth; the winds piped loud and wild, and the answering sea danced and shouted to the sound; there was not a twinkle of starlight above, and below there were only the white heads of the billows seen dim and far in the waste. It was now the dead watch, and deep middle of the night.

'We followed the rope with our eye towards our destination; but it was lost in darkness. We could not even see the edge of the cliff against the sky. At length a light appeared like a star, far, far above our heads: it was the signal that all was ready, and we eagerly threw ourselves upon the rope to try, by a strain, whether it was securely enough fastened above. It did not yield.

'"Now, my lads," cried I, "now for the crow's nest! André, my noble heart! you shall lead the way; and although I doubt no man of you, any more than I doubt the mass, yet I myself will bring up the rear. There must be no return, once our feet have left the boat! Remember, I require no compulsion even now: stay below whoever pleases; but if you mount, you shall never descend this way alive. Whatever difficulties we may meet with on the way, or whatever alarm we may hear above, on we must go. This dagger, sharpened on purpose, I shall carry in my mouth, to cut the rope below me on the first murmur of mutiny. Are you all agreed?"

'"Ay, ay, ay!" was the answer from every hero of them. The winds, waves, and rocks shouted their applause; and the sea, rising wildly around us, broke in a deluge over our heads,

'"Now for it, my lads!" cried André, in the midst of the din—"Follow who will, here I go like a rigger!" and he sprang upon the rope, and disappeared in the darkness above. Up they jumped behind him, one after another, head and shoulders. Sacré! it would have done your Majesty's heart good to have seen it! Up they jumped—the rope swung, the sea roared—hurrah! I sheathed my dagger, for I saw there would be no use for it: and, drunken with exultation, as the last man left the gunwale, I almost leaped upon his shoulders.

'We had gained the middle, three hundred yards from the surface of the sea, and three hundred yards from the surface of the land. We were in total darkness; and the rope, notwithstanding our enormous weight, agitated by the rocking of the boat, and the rushing of the storm, swung and swayed like a thread.

'"Hold fast!" cried the Lieutenant at that moment—but there was no need of the command. We had all stopped suddenly, as if we had been one man, and clung with a death-grip to the rope. We knew not whether the danger—imminent, mortal, and overwhelming—was above or below; but we felt as if we were lost. A hundred different ideas swept through my mind in one instant; but the predominating one was that Monique had been discovered, and that the garrison were heaving off the rope above. I was confirmed in this belief by a wild and piercing voice screaming into my ears,—it was the voice of Monique! But this was impossible!—or, had they thrown her headlong down, shrieking into the abyss?

'That I heard and felt all this in the compass of a few seconds may seem strange, and yet it is most true. The next moment, the motion of the rope which had produced these ideas was repeated, and a shudder seemed to run through it from end to end. It then swayed so wide and so high, being carried with the boat driving from her moorings on the top of an enormous wave, that it was with the utmost difficulty we kept our hold: and it then broke off from its lashings, with a report like that of a cannon, and we swung far and free in the storm.

'Thrice we were flung with such violence against the cliff, that many of our helmets crashed like nutshells; but at last, by desperate and continued efforts, grasping at the nearest fissures of the rock, we contrived to keep the frail machine comparatively steady. It was some time before we thought of resuming our progress; and there we hung, in the dead middle of the night, suspended three hundred feet above the roaring sea, supported by nothing more than a rope fastened three hundred feet above our heads by the weak fingers of a maid.

'I at last became impatient, and passed the word to go on; but the order was given in vain. Notwithstanding my threat of cutting the rope in case of mutiny, it seemed as if the very fact of the existence of a communication with the boat had had the effect of nerving the hearts of some of the men, which now failed them when that communication was cut off. André, the leader of the crew, he on whom I depended so much, sunk suddenly into a state of stupefaction and despair; and when I demanded furiously the cause of the delay, word was passed to me from mouth to mouth, that he had declared himself to be unable to proceed a step higher.

'The situation was terrible. The faint tones in which some of the men spoke informed me that the contagion was spreading; we should hang there—those who had nerve enough to preserve their hold—till daylight appeared; and, when discovered by the garrison, we should be dropped down into the hissing hell of waters, with the deriding and exulting cries of the victors ringing, like the laughter of demons, in our ears!

'"Wretch!" I exclaimed, "it is better that one perish than all!" and, passing the word to hold fast, I climbed up the rope over the heads of my comrades. Each man, as I reached him, assured me, although some with faltering voices, that his resolution was unshaken, and that if I only cleared the way, he would follow me to the death; but when I arrived at André, he was immoveable. His voice was fearfully calm, while he told me that he felt it impossible to go on,—that he would remain there and die.

'"That you shall not," said I; "the lives of so many brave men shall not be sacrificed to the despair of a coward;" and grappling with him fiercely, I tore his feeble hands from their hold, and bent him down over the abyss. I know not what withheld my arm, as I was about to send him headlong into the sea; but I believe it was the remembrance of that gentle scene I had witnessed with him at the village church. I can hardly understand it now; but at that moment, even amidst the howling of the night tempest, I heard the maidens' voices, in their sweet wild song, swell distinctly on my ear, and the innocent face of his young fair mistress gleamed upon me like a spirit through the darkness.

'My heart was softened, but my tongue bitter. I raised him up, and fixed his hands again upon the rope; and, with every execration that hate and scorn could teach the human lips, I stabbed him repeatedly, but not deeply, in the legs and back with my dagger. The sense of pain roused him to the sense of insult; and at length, as I repeated my attacks, his fear vanished, and grasping the rope with one hand, he tugged at his sword with the other to combat his enemy on the spot.

'"I will meet you on the ramparts," said I, sliding down the backs of my comrades to my original post.

'"On! on!" cried they, with one voice: "the day breaks!—on, or we are lost!" and André rushed frantically up the trembling ladder.

'We at length gained the edge of the precipice, and crept one by one upon the ramparts. That moment was delightful! we unbound our swords and battle-axes, and my comrades gathered round me to take orders for the assault. Monique at the instant startled us by bursting into the circle. She sunk down before me, and clasped my knees.

'"They are asleep!" said she, in a whisper that was heard distinctly by all present—"they are sound asleep—calm and unsuspecting on their peaceful beds! Oh, spare them! spare them!"—But we did not spare them!'

'Wretch!' cried Gabrielle, 'after having just escaped such dangers yourselves!'

'That was just the reason,' returned Boisrosé; 'we had no fancy to be hurled down the cliff again; the numbers were three to one against us; and before we had nearly reduced them to an equality, so many had time to rub their eyes and arm, that, after all, we had a fair stand-up fight for the fort, which we gained—besides, they were Protestants.'

'Thank Heaven!' exclaimed Gabrielle, 'that you have come to an end one way or other. I am sure, I wished heartily that the rope had broken above, rather than below you; for I thought you never meant to have got more than half-way; and certes, if I had gone to bed, with my imagination hanging with you on that eternal line, the storm shrieking in my ears, and the sea roaring at my feet, I should have risen in the morning mad!—Now tell me, out of what stale romance have you filched that adventure?'

'It is all true, Madam,' said the Marquis of Rosny—'true, every syllable, as I have had an opportunity of knowing. If ever I write the history of my own time, I shall not forget, be assured, the story of the Rock of the Fort.'*

SIR WALTER AND HIS WRONG-HEADEDNESS.

We are desirous that a passage in our yesterday's first article should not be misunderstood. It is where we allude to Sir Walter Scott's forgetfulness of the distressed state of the labouring poor. We do not mean to imply that he is in his own person a hard-hearted man. We believe him to be the reverse. We believe him, among his friends and acquaintances, and those who are dependent on him, to be a man of very humane intercourse, very kind and generous. But how much does not this add to the infamy of the iniquitous system, which can render the imagination of such a man insensible to the wants of his fellow-creatures, at the least possible given distance from his own sphere? It so prevails upon him, that he not only lives in the past, by the natural turn of his genius, but is content to do so, in spite of all the cries and sufferings of the present, in spite of inequalities which he could not bear to contemplate on his own premises, in spite of the lessons of the past itself, in spite of the horror expressed even in his own works, and of the horrible scenes he has been obliged to paint.

Sir Walter Scott prophecies nothing but ill for the future, and yet speaks of God and the government of the world. To be sure, he falls into an inconsistency in doing this; for in order to save the reputation of the divine arbiter, whom he has undertaken to bring personally into the question, he allows that good will be brought out of the evil. Knowledge and habit are always struggling in him for the mastery, and uttering two voices. The impression, however, which he wishes to leave on the minds of his auditors, is of the most evil augury. There is a curious passage in Dante's 'Inferno,' in which he introduces those who undertook to make use of God's name in their prophecies of the future, and to play the diviner and mystic, as condemned, for their arrogant looks into futurity, to walk with their faces the wrong way, and be eternally looking at the past. Thus they walked one way, and looked another. They proceeded onwards, as Sir Walter does, and as all the rest of the world are doing, and yet could see nothing but retrospectively. Among them is his name-sake and predecessor in enchantment, Michael Scott, who, says Dante,— De le magiche frode seppe il giuoco."

"——— veramente

"Was deep in all the wiles of magic art."

Digitized by Google

His wizard lore, however, according to the great poet, did not hinder him from being one of the most wrong-headed of men: nor has Sir Walter been saved by his. This passage in Dante singularly tallies with the happy quotation of Mr Hazlitt, calling Sir Walter "a prophecier of things past."

Spenser, in converting the fiction of Dante to his own purposes, has made the retrospective face the characteristic of Ignorance; and Ignorance he makes the Keeper of Pride's Castle, and foster-father of that Giant:—

> "But very uncouth sight was to behold,
> How he did fashion his untoward pace;
> For as he forward moov'd his footing old,
> So backward still was turned his wrincled face:
> Unlike to men, who ever, as they trace
> Both feet and face, one way are wont to lead.
> This was the auncient Keeper of that place,
> And foster-father of the Gyaunt dead;
> His name Ignaro did his nature right aread."
> Faerie Queen, Book I.

A more ignorant set of men, in the deepest and most serious meaning of that word, we do not believe to exist, than the party to which education has happened to attach Sir Walter; but it is hard in Toryism to have done such mischief to one of the most precious heads of the time, as to have wrenched it into the very personification of Ignorance.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

[Reader, if the following little effusion hath not a tone in it, that maketh it fit company for the lute of Beaumont and Fletcher, then hath friendship marvellously bewitched our hearing. The author, though he hath sent us divers other memorials of his art, hath ungratefully sworn that he will write no more poetry; so that these and all other verses, which may appear under the like signature (which by the way is of our giving) are to be considered as the remains of an Ex-Poet,—a new kind of abdicated praise, which we trust the world will not tolerate, as being of a totally different race from those who are "most tolerable, and not to be endured."]

SONG, FOR MUSIC.

I.

Is my lover on the sea?
Sailing East, or sailing West?
Mighty ocean, gentle be:
Rock him into rest.

II.

Let no hateful wind arise,
Nor a wave with angry crest;
All be gentle as his eyes,
When he is caress'd.

EXTRACTS FROM NEW BOOKS.

INTERVIEW BETWEEN THE PRINCE DE LIGNE AND ROUSSEAU.

When Rousseau returned from his exile, I called to see him in his garret in the Rue Platrière; but up to the moment of my reaching the landing-place of his apartment, I had not made up my mind as to the most advisable way of introducing myself. Instinct has frequently served me better than reflection; so that I trusted to chance, and entered boldly. "Who is there?" said Jean-Jacques.—"I beg pardon, sir," I said, "I wish to see M. Rousseau of Toulouse."—"I am Rousseau of Geneva."—"Oh! the great botanist, I suppose, from what I see there. What a number of plants and big volumes! They are more valuable than all those that are written!" Rousseau made a grin which almost amounted to a smile, and he forthwith set about showing me the collection of leaves and plants inserted in his folio volumes. I feigned an admiration, which was surely not deserved by what I saw before me, and Rousseau resumed his work, with his spectacles and nose almost touching the sheets, and quite unmindful of my presence. I asked pardon for interrupting him once more, and inquired where M. Rousseau of Toulouse was to be found; but for fear he should tell me, and thus cut off at once all pretext for my staying, I added, "Is it true that you possess so much skill in copying music?" Upon this he immediately went and fetched some books, which he showed me, saying, "See how neat that is!" Then he went on speaking of the difficulty of the labour, and of his own peculiar aptitude for it, like Sganarelle, who prided himself so much in making fagots. The respect I felt for such a man had given me a sort of shivering when I put my hand on the latch of his door to open it, and prevented me from prolonging a conversation which might have seemed an intended mystification had it been made to last longer. I thought enough had passed to serve as an introduction, and appearing as if I was about to withdraw, I observed that I supposed he had merely recourse to such an occupation for the purpose of cooling occasionally the heat of his imagination. "Alas!" said he, "other occupations, intended for my own and other people's instruction, have done me but too much injury." I observed that the only part of his writings on which I fully agreed with him, was where he shows the danger of possessing historical and literary knowledge without a mind sufficiently matured in judgment. On this, he put aside his work and his spectacles, and he entered into a discussion of the subject, in which he displayed a refinement of ideas superior to what is evinced by most of his writings, and which perhaps the solitude around him, when committing his thoughts to paper, has always prevented his works from bearing the exact character of. In the course of his remarks, he indulged freely in exclamations on the perverseness of mankind. I had so far succeeded as to venture to contradict him. I said, "Those who complain of mankind are themselves men, so that they may very easily deceive themselves in regard to others." This made him reflect a little. I added that I was likewise of his opinion as to the manner of granting and receiving favours, and the extent of gratitude when favours come from those for whom it is impossible to entertain any regard. This appeared to hit his fancy. I then entered on the other extreme which was to be apprehended—ingratitude. On this he darted into a variety of reflections, and made the most vivid allusions, which he mixed up with some sophistical maxims. I interrupted him at last by saying, "But supposing Mr Hume were sincere?" He asked me if I was acquainted with him. I said that I had had a very animated conversation with him regarding his (Rousseau's) writings, and that the fear of being unjust prevented me from expressing the opinions I had formed relative to persons.

His nasty wife, or maid-servant, interrupted us occasionally by asking questions about her linen or her broth. He answered her always in a manner which would have exalted even the most unworthy things in nature. He did not appear to distrust me in the least. I had, indeed, kept his mind in a constant tension since I had come in, that he might not have even a moment's time to reflect on my visit. I put an end to it at last, much against my inclination, and after fixing for a moment the countenance of the author of the Nouvelle Héloïse, I quitted the garret, the abode of rats, but the sanctuary of genius. He rose, conducted me to the stairs with an air expressive of interest, but he did not ask my name. He would not, to be sure, have retained it in his memory, for the names only of such men as Tacitus, Sallustus, and Pliny could make a lasting impression on his mind.

When afterwards I learnt among the intimate friends of the Prince de Conti, such as the Archbishop of Toulouse, the President d'Aligre, and other prelates and parliamentary members, that those two classes of corrupted men intended to throw Jean Jacques again into trouble, I addressed to him the letter which he showed about, or very improperly caused to be copied, and which appeared afterwards in all the public prints. He thought proper, according to his usual practice, to look upon the offer it contained of a retreat as a snare which his enemies had prevailed on me to set for him. This kind of madness had most strangely taken possession of this great and unhappy man. His first impression, however, was always good; and the day after he received my letter he called on me to return his thanks. When Rousseau's name was announced I could hardly trust my ears; when he opened the door, I could hardly trust my eyes. Louis XIV did not perhaps experience a prouder feeling when he received the embassy from Siam than I did on this occasion. The account he gave of his misfortunes, the description of his enemies, and his belief that all Europe had conspired against him, would have been really painful, had he not embellished his discourse by the charms of eloquence. I endeavoured to divert his mind from thoughts so gloomy by directing his attention to rural amusements. I asked how he, who was so fond of the country, could think of remaining in such a noisy and bustling place as Paris. He then made some of his paradoxical reflections relative to the power of writing on liberty in prison, and of describing the charms of spring whilst the snow is lying on the ground. I spoke of Switzerland, and I showed, without seeming to intend it, that I knew his Héloïse and Saint-Preux by heart. It became evident to him that his Nouvelle Héloïse was the only one of his works which suited my fancy, and that even if I were capable of deep thought, I should never give myself the trouble of thinking intensely. I believe I never displayed so much wit (and it was perhaps the only time in my life that I took any pains for that purpose) as during the eight hours that my two conversations with Jean-Jacques took up. When he intimated to me that he was determined to await in Paris all the decrees of arrest with which he was threatened by the clergy and the parliament, I took the liberty of making some severe remarks relative to his mode of conceiving what celebrity consisted in. "Monsieur Rousseau," I said, "the more you hide yourself, the more you expose yourself to notoriety; the more you wish to live like a misanthrope, the more you will become a public man."

His eyes were as brilliant as two stars. There was a radiancy of genius in the expression of his features which almost electrified me. I remember that our conversation closed by my saying to him two or three times, with tears in my eyes, "I wish, sir, you may be happy in spite of yourself. If you are determined not to inhabit the temple I would raise for you on the estate to which I have a sovereign right, and where there is neither clergy nor parliament to molest you, but in lieu thereof the prettiest sheep in the world, stay, and you may be happy in France. If, as I hope, you are suffered to remain unmolested, sell all your works, buy some pretty little country-house in the neighbourhood of Paris, open your doors only to a few of your admirers, and depend upon it you will be soon forgotten." I do not believe this would have suited him exactly, nor do I think that he would have stayed much longer at Ermonville had not death overtaken him there. He seemed touched with the effect he produced on me; and convinced of the enthusiastic feeling I entertained for him, he expressed a greater interest and acknowledgement than he was in the habit of evincing to any one. I experienced after his leaving me the same kind of vacuous feeling which is felt on awaking after a very fine dream.—Journal of a Nobleman.

PRINCE DE LIGNE'S LETTER TO ROUSSEAU.

Sir,—I am the person who called on you the other day. I would wish to do so again, but I will not, for you are not fond of eager manifestations.

Pray think of what I proposed to you. In my country people are unable to read, therefore you will neither be admired nor persecuted there.

You shall have the key of my library and of my gardens. You shall see me or not, just as you please. You shall have a pretty little country-house to yourself, at a short distance from mine: you will plant and sow there, and do just as you please.

Jean Baptiste and his wit ended their days in Flanders; but he only made verses. Jean Jacques and his genius would live there. Let it be at mine or his abode that you may continue vitam impendere vero. If you desire still greater liberty, I have another bit of land which is dependent on no one, where the sky is clear and the air pure, and it is only eighty leagues from hence. I have neither an archbishop nor a parliament; but instead of them, I have the finest sheep in the world. There are bee-hives in abundance, which shall be yours if you like them: if not, they shall be taken away. That republic would behave better to you than the republic of Geneva, to which you have done so much honour, and would have done so much good.

Like you, Sir, I neither love thrones nor arbitrary rule. You will reign over no one, but no one shall reign over you. If you accept my offer, I will call for you, and take you to the Temple of Virtue. That shall be the name of your habitation; but we will not call it thus, and your modesty shall be spared all the triumphs you deserve. If all this does not suit you, let it pass as if it had never been said. I shall not see you, but I shall continue to read your works, and to admire you.—The same.

AN ITALIAN GOVERNESS.

A maid-servant from Provence had, somehow or other, made her way to Moscow, where she gave herself out as a lady of education, who wanted a situation as governess. She contrived, in fact, to impose on the credulity of a lady of respectability, who engaged her chiefly for the purpose of teaching Italian to her daughter. The governess knew not a word of this language; but as her own native tongue, the Provençal, bears some resemblance to Italian, in regard to pronunciation, she taught that language to her pupil, who, in fact, after three years study, became as complete a mistress of it as the capacity of her governess was able to make her. The imposture, however, could not always remain concealed; but it was a long time before the young lady could be persuaded that she had been losing her time in learning a useless patois.—Journal of a Nobleman. [It has been said that many a French governess in this country, has been a maid-servant, or some such thing, in her own; but in the present times, few persons are so ignorant as to be deceived so grossly; though, doubtless, many are yet employed in that capacity, who are very incompetent.]

DRUMMED OUT.

Ledelius tells of a woman who was very much incommoded by crickets, and tried, but in vain, every method to banish them from her house. She at last accidentally succeeded; for, having one day invited several guests to her house, where there was a wedding, in order to increase the festivity of the entertainment, she procured drums and trumpets to entertain them. The noise of these was so much greater than what the little animals were used to, that they instantly forsook their situation, and were never heard in that mansion more.

SAINT PONCIO AND HIS HIGH OFFICE.

I forget whether it was from the Diario of Madrid or Barcelona that I took the following singular heading in relation to the religious ceremonies of the day. "To-morrow, being Friday, will be celebrated the feast of the glorious martyr, San Poncio, advocate and protector against bed-bugs—abogado contra las chinches." There will be mass all the morning, and at seven o'clock will take place the blessing of branches and flowers, in honor of the aforesaid saint. The branches and flowers thus blessed are doubtless found efficacious in preserving houses from these irksome tenants, and so form a convenient substitute for the troublesome care of cleanliness.—A Year in Spain.

ROYAL RUSTICITIES.

The palace of Buen Retiro, where the court lived before the completion of the new palace, is at the eastern extremity of Madrid, overlooking the Prado. The garden of the Retiro is of great extent, but its situation is high and exposed, and the walks are far from agreeable. The present family has directed the different improvements, if indeed they may be so called, which are in progress here, and perhaps nowhere has there been so much labor expended, and so little produced. In one place is an artificial mound, with a Chinese Temple perched upon it; in another, a little cottage, with an old woman of wood sitting by a painted fire, and rocking her baby in a cradle; overhead are wooden hams and leathern sausages; whilst in an adjoining room, the good man of the house is ill and in bed, with a pot of soup beside him, and he rises by machinery when strangers enter. In another part, is an oblong lake, enclosed with a wall of cut stone, and a rich railing of iron. On one side of it is a small building surmounted by naval emblems, and a flagstaff, and beneath it is a dock or cove for the royal galley. The elevation of the Retiro is an obstacle to the bringing of water in pipes to fill the lake, and the object is therefore effected by the labor of a mule, who turns a wheel hard by, and is hidden under a rustic shed adorned with Egyptian pagods. Sometimes the royal family take a water excursion upon the lake. The basin is then filled, the gilded barge, which is truly classic in its construction, is floated to the stairs of the navy-yard, and the august individuals enter and put forth, with an air of perfect contentment and unaffected complacency, to the great admiration of the beholders, which is evinced by waving of hats and handkerchiefs. If you happen to be near the wheel-house, the creaking of the machinery, the Arre! of the muleteer, and the grunting of the mule, furnish a suitable musical accompaniment to this raree show.—The same.

THE SAME IS NOT THE SAME.

We heard this morning of a whimsical mistake of identity which occurred a few days before, and is the common talk of the town. An officer in Uhlan's corps of cavalry, well known to the consul, was walking along the streets, when a Bulgarian woman rushed out of her house, and ran towards him, exclaiming, "My dear boy! what! now that you are in a fine dress, are you ashamed of your poor mother?" Soon after an old woman claimed him for her grandson, and the younger branches of the family hailed him as a brother. He managed to make his escape for the time, but in passing through the streets, shortly after, he was upbraided for his unnatural conduct in disowning his relations. Thus assailed, he applied to Count Diebitsch for protection. An inquiry was established through the medium of the Bulgarian archbishop. The parties were confronted; the supposed mother called out, "If he be my son, he has a scar on the left side of his forehead" The officer's cap was removed, and, strange to say, the scar appeared on the identical spot. The woman triumphantly exclaimed, "He had that scar when he was eight years old." Here several Russian officers interposed, and said that the officer had left St Petersburgh without scar, and had received it in an affair with the enemy before Shumla. Thus ended this comedy of errors.—Major Keppel's Journey Across the Balcan, &c.

INGENIOUS MODE OF CONFESSING COWARDICE.

Near Radosto, we saw a young soldier mounted on a handsome charger, the reins of which were held by an old Turk with a venerable white beard. They were father and son. The younger man was known to John. His family was rich, and lived near the Asiatic castle of the Dardanelles. John asked him where he had been: he replied, "Military ardour inspired me with a wish to join my brave comrades in arms: but God's providence put fear into my heart, and so I returned.—The same.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

A Treatise on Hydrostatics. By the Rev. Dionysius Lardner, LL.D. F.R.S. (Being the Seventeenth Volume of the Cabinet Cyclopædia). 12mo. pp. 353. Longman.

THIS treatise upon the laws which govern Liquids and Air, and upon the powers which they develope in experiment, is written in that style of ease, clearness, and propriety, which is one of the most agreeable results of the study of the sciences, and which seems to place the writer before us, expounding from his professional chair. But as the volume consists almost entirely of experimental illustrations, accompanied with engravings, and as we neither profess to be scientific, nor, to say the truth, are led by our inclinations to put the author's developments to the test, by any mode of pursuing his deductions, we can only profess our belief, that readers of a different turn will find abundance of useful and entertaining matter in his pages. We need not add, that the book is got up with the usual neatness. The illustrative figures amount in number to 130. While we acknowledge, however, this disinclination of ours, or, we should rather say, our incompetence (for we flatter ourselves that we might have been taught to like what we know to be so worthy of liking) we would fain claim the merit, as our parenthesis implies, of being deeply sensible of the importance of those branches of knowledge, which bear fruits of the most wonderful utility, aye, and of beauty too; beauty and utility being, in fact, as inseparable as the interests of those classes of men who sometimes fancy that they can be divided. We have touched upon this point before, in our remarks upon the admirable book of Mr Herschel! but we can never look at a scientific treatise without thinking of it, any more than we can abstract form and colour from the objects of science, or take blue ont of the sky, or the imagination and affections out of all those myriads of human beings, who are destined to reap the benefits of the severest philosophy.

Among the passages of Dr Lardner's book which may be selected without missing the illustrative engravings, the following are some of the most curious. We read the other day in the newspapers, of a proposed contrivance by which gentlemen were to converse in whispers from Liverpool to Manchester. (By the way, we know not what unlooked-for facilities the men of science may ultimately supply to proceedings not at all in their contemplation; for soft whispers are not confined to waggoners; and while the fathers are perfecting their iron ways, and sighing gruff orders for coals at the rate of fifty miles a second, the children may be employing collateral tubes for the arrangement of a jaunt to Gretna). Dr Lardner tells us of a new means of communication by water:—

'If a tube filled with water extended from London to York, a pressure excited on the liquid at the extremity in London, would be instantaneously transmitted to the extremity at York. It has been suggested, that such means might be used for telegraphic communications in situations where the frequency or importance would justify the expense of laying down pipes or tubes. An ingenious person in this country has tried the experiment with this view, and has laid down several miles of pipe for the purpose. Such a method of communication would have the advantage of being independent of those accidental interruptions to which lights, signals, and other similar contrivances are exposed.'

At page 58 is an agreeable account of the optical deception, by which the waves of the sea appear to have a progressive motion; but it is too long to extract, and the illustrative figures ought not to be wanting. However, we may give the following passages:—

'When we perceive the waves of the sea apparently advancing in a certain direction, we are irresistibly impressed with a notion that the sea itself is advancing in that direction. We consider that the same wave, as it advances, is composed of the same water, and that the whole surface of the liquid is in a state of progressive motion. A slight reflection, however, on the consequences of such a supposition, will soon convince us that it is unfounded. The ship which floats upon the waves is not carried forward with them; they pass beneath her, now lifting her on their summits, and now letting her sink into the abyss between. Observe a sea-fowl floating on the water, and the same effect will be seen. If, however, the water itself partook of the motion which we ascribe to its waves, the ship and the fowl would each be carried forward, and would have a motion in common with the liquid. Once on the summit of a wave, there they would continually remain, and their motion would be as smooth as if they were propelled upon the calm surface of a lake. Or if once in the valley between two waves, there likewise they would continually remain, the one wave continually preceding them, and the other following.

'In like manner, if we observe the waves continually approaching the shore, we must be convinced that this apparent motion is not one in which the water has any share: for were it so, the waters of the sea would soon be heaped upon the shores and would inundate the adjacent country: but so far from the waters partaking of the apparent motion of the waves in approaching the shore, this motion of the waves continues, even when the waters are retiring. If we observe a flat strand when the tide is ebbing, we shall still find the waves moving towards the shore.

'That the apparent motion of the waves is, therefore, an illusion, we can no longer doubt; but we are naturally curious to know what is the cause of this illusion. That a progressive motion takes place in something, we have proof, from the evidence of sight. That no progressive motion takes place in the liquid, we have also proof, both from the evidence of sight, and from other still more unquestionable testimony. To what then does the motion belong? We answer, to the form of the wave, and not to the liquid which composes it.'

'It is the same cause (that which produces the deceptive appearance of a progressive motion in the waves of the sea) which makes a revolving cork-screw, held in a fixed position, seem to be advancing in that direction in which it would actually advance if the worm were passing through a cork. That point which is nearest to the eye, and which corresponds to the crest of the wave in the former example, continually occupies a different point of the worm, and continually advances towards its extremity.

'This property has lately been prettily applied in ornamental clocks. A piece of glass, twisted so that its surface acquires a ridge in the form of a screw, is inserted in the mouth of some figure designed to represent a fountain. One end of the glass is attached to the axle of a wheel, which the clockwork keeps in a state of constant rotation, and the other end is concealed in a vessel, designed to represent a reservoir or basin. The continual rotation of the twisted glass produces the appearance of a progressive motion, as already explained, and a stream of water continually appears to flow from the fountain into the basin.'

There is a popular notion, that the blue colour of the sky, besides being occasioned by distance, resides, as it were, in the distance itself. But how? What is a distance that can be coloured? The colour is in the atmosphere: it is the air that is blue: this green earth is surrounded by a blue air. Are not those very pretty colours, reader, to make a planet of, in which our posterity are all to be so useful and so comfortable?

'The atmosphere,' says Dr Lardner, 'is the thin transparent fluid which surrounds the earth to a considerable height above its surface, and which, in virtue of one of its constituent elements, supports animal life by respiration, and is necessary also to the due exercise of the vegetable functions. This substance is generally, but erroneously, regarded as invisible. That it is not invisible may be proved by turning our view to the firmament: that, in the presence of light, appears a vault of an azure or blue colour. This colour belongs not to anything which occupies the space in which the stars and other celestial objects are placed, but to the mass of air through which these bodies are seen. It may probably be asked, if the air be an azure-coloured body, why is not that which immediately surrounds us perceived to have this azure colour, in the same manner as a blue liquid contained in a bottle exhibits its proper hue? The question is easily answered.

'There are certain bodies which reflect colour so faintly, that, when they exist in limited quantities, the portion of coloured light which they transmit to the eye is insufficient to produce sensation, that is, to excite in the mind a perception of the colour. Almost all semitransparent bodies are examples of this. Let a champagne glass be filled with sherry, or other wine of that colour; at the thickest part, near the top of the glass, the wine will strongly exhibit its peculiar colour, but as the glass tapers, and its thickness is diminished, this colour will become more faint; and at the lowest point, it will almost disappear, the liquid seeming nearly as transparent as water.'

* * * * * *

'The water of the sea exhibits another remarkable example of this effect. If we look into the sea where the water has considerable depth, we find that its colour is a peculiar shade of green; but if we take up a glass of the water which thus appears green, we shall find it perfectly limpid and colourless. The reason is, that the quantity contained in the glass reflects to the eye too small a quantity of the colour to be perceivable; while the great mass of water, viewed when we look into the deep sea, throws up the colour in such abundance, as to produce a strong and decided perception of it.

'The atmosphere is in the same circumstances: the colour, from even a considerable portion of it, is too faint to be perceptible, Hence the air which fills an apartment, or which immediately surrounds us when abroad, appears colourless and perfectly transparent. But when we behold the immense mass of atmosphere through which we view the firmament, the colour is reflected with sufficient force to produce distinct perception. But it is not necessary for this that so great an extent of air should be exhibited to us as that which forms the whole depth or thickness of the atmosphere. Distant mountains appear blue, not because that is their colour, but because it is the colour of the medium through which they are seen.'

A hundred years ago, it would have been thought that there could be no greater illustration of an impossibility than to say of such and such a thing, "You might as soon expect to encounter your dog two thousand feet in the air, and to see him whining to come to you." Yet an aëronaut did this:—

'M. Blanchard dropped a dog suspended from a parachute, from the altitude of 6000 feet above the surface of the earth. A whirlwind interrupted its descent, and carried it above the clouds. The aëronaut soon after met the parachute again; the dog recognised its master, and expressed his uneasiness and solicitude by barking; another current of air, however, carried him off, and he was lost sight of. The parachute with the dog descended soon after the aëronaut in safety.'

The Romance of History. France. By Leitch Ritchie. Second Edition. In 3 vols. 8vo. Bull.

[Notice Concluded.]

In saying that Mr Ritchie has a tendency to be carried away into something over-dramatic in his incidents, we do not mean to imply that he is not often truly and affectingly dramatic. He is unquestionably so. We cannot call to mind, at the moment, any writer of a series of brief stories, who has so often surprised us in that particular; and we know of no such writer, who combines so many of the qualities of his wit so much to our liking. His tendency is to be exuberant in most things, not out of bad taste, but from an excess of relish for what is immediately before him: yet there is a strong spirit of good-sense pervading all; and we never met conjoined in an equal degree, under the same circumstances, the perception of the severe, the gentle, the judicious, the beautiful, and the true. There are two or three of his stories, we grant, which would give a reader but little notion that he could write the others; and some of them are disfigured by artificial displays, unworthy of the characters that give way to them, and by hurried and forced conclusions, like the lugging in of the dramatis personæ on a stage. We allude in particular to the termination of the 'Rock of the Fort,' and to the behaviour of Matilda with the wine cup in the 'Breton Kings.' But his three volumes are altogether an enchanted palace, in the rooms of which we encounter a singular variety of things gorgeous and fair, with scenes of interest both lively and mournful, with striking landscapes through the windows, with glimpses of masculine and bearded men, not unworthy of Sir Walter himself, and with heroes and heroines, in the book sense of the word, certainly superior to the young lay-figures, which the genius of Scotland has thought proper to send southward, as the legitimate specimens of youth and love. We will just run through the list of Mr Ritchie's stories, with a glance at each:—

'Bertha,' or the Court of Charlemagne.'—This is the famous story of Charlemagne's daughter, and her taking her lover on her shoulders across the snow of her father's court-yard. It is very prettily managed, and with a happy introduction of another lover, who is unsuccessful. The introduction of Charlemagne, in the incognito of his plebeian clothes, appears to have been suggested by that of Louis the Eleventh in 'Quentin Durward.'

'The Last of the Breton Kings.'—This story appears to us to be altogether forced, with the exception of the picture of the rebel king's palace, and its surrounding scenery.

'The Adventures of Eriland.'—Forced; and the descriptive details not very clear.

'The Man-Wolf.' Perhaps the least successful of all the stories.

'The King of the Beggars.'—Forced; and melo-dramatic.

'The Serf.'—Excellent and original: with an appalling catastrophe.

'The Pilgrim of St James.'—One of the most pleasing romances we ever read, with a genuine nice girl in it, and good unexpected incident. The part of the Bedouir is a little forced, but not more so than has been allowed in many of the romances of Sir Walter.

'The Bondsman's Feast.'—Excellent again: one of those stories that make us like the writer: and after much threat of the reverse, it ends well. Mr Ritchie does not see why there should not be happy endings, and truly amiable characters, in books as well as in life. He is destined to add to the stock of happy stories, of which there are far too few.

'The Phantom Fight.'—Very good indeed; founded on a favorite exhibition of Mr Ritchie's, that of a plebeian character exercising patrician authority. The unexpected appearance of the heroine as a page on the field of battle, resembles, if we recollect rightly, a passage in one of Lord Byron's poems; but we should guess it to be more affecting.

'The Magic Wand.'—Very good. The hero is something of the 'Quentin Durward' order, but a great deal pleasanter; and there is an excellent old mother, who loves him for giving away his last riches to a great lady, and for knocking people on the head who are only citizens.

'The Rock of the Fort.'—Contains a passage of intense interest, as the reader has seen. It is a pity that the characters are all so theatrically brought in at the conclusion.

'The Dream Girl.'—This is a wild story of a beautiful but unimpressible girl, whose sensibility is roused by terror. We are not sure that we like it. But the picture of her, as a supposed phantom, passing by her lover in a state of ghastly somnambulism, is very striking.

'The Black Mask, or the Lottery of Jewels.'—Good; and fit to crown the work in point of style. Some well known French courtiers and literati are well introduced; and the heartless ascendancy of the character of Madame de Maintenon, is better hit off, than we ever remember to have seen it. The hero's first interviews with her are very good; and the description of the army skating across the ice to the Hague is admirable. It must not be omitted that in this as in other instances, some of our author's wildest looking incidents, agreeably to the title of his book, are matters of history.

On looking back through the volumes, our objection to the superabundance of the author's epithets does not appear to be well founded,—certainly not as a prevailing fault. We must have been led into the mistake, by a sense of his exuberance in other matters. He has shown himself in this work, an unequal, but a beautiful writer; capable, we have no doubt, of throwing off all his inequalities, and of adding to his beauties; and we thank him heartily for the pleasure it has afforded us.

TRAVELLERS DIFFER.

The visit to the antiquities was not effected without attracting the curiosity of the inhabitants, especially of the female portion. One of them, a beautiful girl, apparently about seventeen, followed me at some little distance. On my turning round, I saw her with a veil in her hand. The moment our eyes met, she threw it over her face with well acted confusion, her object being, evidently, as much to be seen, as to see. It is the fashion for travellers in Turkey to speak of the horror the women have of being unveiled before men, and especially before Christians. My own observations leads to the opposite conclusion: I consider it as a general rule, that no Turkish lady, having a convenient opportunity, objects to show her face, always provided that she considers her face worth showing.—Major Keppel's Journey across the Balcan [It can never be possible to judge of a whole people, or of a large proportion of a people, from a hurried visit, even if the traveller be, as in this instance, acquainted with their language; but it must be admitted the Major's surmise is a natural one, that a pretty woman, even in Turkey, is not much shocked at the thought of showing her face. The Major has, doubtless, observed in his own country, that the ladies the most scrupulously modest in hiding their ankles, are not those who have the prettiest.]

A VISIT TO THE GOVERNOR OF GHIEDIZ.

As soon as I had finished my excursion, I went with Mustapha to the waiwoda (governor) of the town, who invited me to dinner: he was a well-bred and agreeable man, and spoke Persian with much fluency; a fortunate circumstance for me, as I was able to converse with him without the aid of an interpreter. Our repast was excellent, consisting of an alternate succession of meats and sweetmeats. Among other good things, was some khelwar, a composition of flour, butter, and honey. After I had done ample justice to all the savory dishes, a miserable chicken, boiled to rags, was brought to table, and having been torn limb from limb by my host, was put upon my plate, with the intimation that I must eat it all, as it was notorious that no Englishman considered himself to have dined, without first demolishing a boiled fowl. This was a drawback on the feast, but there was no help for it; so, patiently resigning myself to the anticipated horrors of indigestion, I was fain to swallow this unpalatable compliment. To make amends for my host's misinformation on the score of English eating, he made a better guess of what we liked to drink. He placed before me a French tea-pot full of wine, of which, like the plate of chicken, I was doomed to swallow the whole contents; as, though he was in the habit of drinking all kinds of spirituous liquors, it was necessary, while he was in office, to set an example of sobriety to his followers; drunkenness and tasting wine being, with Turks, almost synonymous terms. The only persons at dinner besides the waiwoda, myself, and Carle, who was allowed a place as interpreter, was a very handsome Georgian boy, who is said to have great influence over the aga, and to dispose of the limited patronage of the town as best suits his own caprice. Even on the question of inviting me to dinner, it seemed as if a previous consultation had been held between the waiwoda and his favorite. We were in the middle of our meal, when two unhappy-looking wretches were brought before us, by a party of armed cavasses. These men had both refused to enter the service: one of them had a long beard, and was, in all probability, the father of a family. The business was settled; the waiwoda nodded his head, and the poor fellows were sent to be enrolled under the holy banner.—The same.

STORY OF A GREEK GIRL.

Among the servants of the Consul (at Adrianople) is a beautiful Greek of the name of Marigo, who comes nearer to my idea of a Hebe than almost any other woman I ever saw. Moreover, she is not only very pretty, but very good. Her adventures are a picture of the country and times in which she lives. I relate them as I heard them, partly from Mr Duveluz (the Consul), and partly from her own mouth. She was born at Scio; her father, a man in comfortable circumstances, was remarked for his facetious character, even in that island, the former abode of wit and mirth. At the insurrection of Scio, he was one of the first who fell in that terrible massacre. His unhappy widow, with four children, of whom Marigo was the youngest, fled into the mountains, with a little dry bread and a pitcher of water, and hid themselves in the cavity of one of the highest rocks in the island. They remained unmolested for two days, though they were kept in dreadful alarm by the constant report of fire-arms, the savage yells of the Turks, and the despairing screams of their victims. Their supply of water being exhausted, the mother resolved, in the dead of night, to replenish the pitcher; but the courageous little Marigo seized it from her mother's hands, said she would fetch the water, that she was the lightest and smallest of them all, and had the best chance of escaping unseen by the Turks.

At midnight she set out on her good and bold enterprise, crept down the rock, and arrived at a spring without any further inconvenience than cutting her feet with the sharp stones. As she was returning, she heard voices in the Turkish language near: she threw herself into a field of standing corn. She had been heard, and was pursued. The Turks hunted for her with their yataghans. At last one of their party slightly wounded her. It was an old white-bearded Negro, who hurried her away towards the town. They stopped at a house, and were admitted by another Negro, who proved to be the son of her captor. The younger Black immediately conceived a violent affection for the pretty captive: a quarrel between the men was the consequence; and it ended in the father seizing a pistol, and discharging the contents into his son's body. The wretched old man became frantic at what he had done, and mingled his yells of grief with his son's dying groans. The wounded man soon expired: the old father then opened the window, took up the corpse, and flung it into the street. He now became more furious than ever. At length he seized Marigo by the hair, dragged her into the street, and offered her for sale. Haji Baba, a nefarious slave-dealer of Adrianople, bought her for a handful of paras (a few pence) and took her to his depôt, where she found a number of companions in misfortune, who, together with herself, were put into a large boat, and landed at Gallipoli, whence she was brought to Adrianople. Here she had the happiness to fall into the hands of my excellent friend, Mr Duveluz, who redeemed her. Ever since he has treated her like a daughter, and she repays his goodness with a daughter's love.

Several of Marigo's companions in misfortune were sold in the Dardanelles, to Turks, though Haji Baba had assured them that he intended to take them to Adrianople, and to dispose of them only to Christians. The greater portion, however, were brought to Adrianople. On his arrival, Haji Baba waited on the Consul, as the Christian subjects of the Porte did not dare to deal with him; and he himself was under the same apprehensions of treating with him openly for his slaves. The Consul requested to see them. He was conducted to the place where they were confined. He describes it as the most heart-rending scene he ever beheld. They were the true picture of misery. Pale, emaciated, sickly, dirty, and in rags, they all flocked around him, and, with the most ardent prayers, begged he would redeem them. The voice of misery never pleaded in vain to my kind-hearted friend. He purchased the redemption of the six youngest; four of them (amongst whom was the pretty Marigo) he sent to Mrs Duveluz, and consigned the two others to the care of his shoemaker, a married man, and an Ionian. In a very few days, through the assistance of the Greek archbishop of Adrianople, together with what he himself could spare, he obtained the liberty of all the poor creatures. Some were comfortably placed in Christian families; and several of the young girls Mr Develuz had the happiness of marrying well in the town, and of restoring others to their relations who had escaped to different parts of Greece. Mr and Mrs Duveluz brought Marigo's mother from Smyrna in 1828. Her two sons, although the Consul offered nine thousand piastres for their ransom, to a Turk at Cassaba, near Smyrna, he never could prevail upon him to sell them; and the Mahometan has since induced them to conform to his religion Marigo's sister has never been heard of.—The same.

TURKISH JUSTICE.

I have mentioned the yafta, or sentence of death. The following is a translation of one that was taken from the breast of a man executed on the 6th of September, and may serve as a specimen of Turkish criminal jurisprudence. It will be observed that the unfortunate sufferer was put to death because another man addressed seditious language to him:—"Achmet, kiaya (chief) of the corporation of merchants dealing in articles of luxury at Constantinople. This wretch obtained, some time ago, through the munificence of his highness, the office of kiaya of this corporation. Instead of showing gratitude for the manifold benefits he had received; instead of thanking God in the five prayers; instead of praying night and day with his family for his highness and the Mussulman nation, in remembrance of the favours with which he had hitherto been loaded; instead of attending to his own business; instead of abstaining from criticising business which did not concern him; instead of living quietly, and being, more than any other of the like employment, attached to government, as his duty and sense of obligation should have compelled him; this man not only omitted making any of these reflections, but made use of seditious language, saying that the seraskier posha, or seraskier capissi, had been torn in pieces, that this and that thing had been done. It is in this manner that he had the audacity to cause to be circulated false intelligence, conduct tending to spread alarm amongst Mahometan people. The fact being alleged, and Achmet being interrogated on the subject, could not deny it. He only maintained that it was not he who had said it, but Abdi, a cavass of the imperial divan, living in the quarter called Feirouz-Aga. Abdi was summoned to appear, who being confronted with Achmet, he also has been unable to deny it. The boldness of their infamous conduct, and of the language they have held on things which did not concern them, proves that these men are ungrateful wretches, traitors, who ought to be made to disappear; and it is thus deemed necessary to execute upon them the penal laws, so that good order may be maintained. In consequence, the traitor, Abdi Cavass, has been executed in another place, and the robber, Achmet, has undergone the punishment here, so that he might seem as an example."—The same.

A DRAMATIC INCIDENT.

One of our party had been employed against the Febees (Rebellious mountaineers, whose chief (Kelmehmet) is a sort of Robin Hood). He told us that a short time ago, a horseman staid to breakfast at a neighbouring village, and consigned his steed, in the meanwhile, to the charge of one of the villagers. On remounting, the stranger asked him what he should give him for holding his horse. "Oh!" said the fellow, "I would not have charged you anything, but I am a poor man, and am obliged to leave my fields uncultivated, to go in pursuit of that scoundrel of a Kelmehmet."—"But what harm has he done you?"—"The trouble he gives me is quite harm enough; and if I catch him, I promise you I'll kill him."—"Don't believe he'll be such a fool as to allow himself to be caught," said the stranger, as he pressed the horse's sides, and set off at full gallop. He was scarcely out of sight, when a crowd entered the village in pursuit of the Kelmehmet. By the description of the person, it was discovered that the Febee chieftain was the identical horseman who had just quitted the town on the opposite side.—The same.

CURIOUS MODE OF TRAVELLING.

In the evening I returned to Bologlou's, where I found a large party of Catholics assembled to meet me at dinner. Many of them were on their return to Constantinople, from banishment, and were in a state of glee very much at variance with the usually steady demeanour of this people. One of the guests was a young man who was on his return with his grandmother, a woman upwards of eighty. When the order for banishment arrived, not knowing what to do with her, he put her into a pannier slung across a horse, and in this manner she had travelled upwards of a hundred miles in the most inclement weather. The good grandson had often given up his aged relative for lost; but she weathered all the storms, and was now travelling homewards, not a jot the worse for her country jaunt.—The same.

TWO MILITARY SISTERS.

Monsieur le Général Comte de Guilleminot (French Ambassador at Pera) commanded a division of Napoleon's army in 1815, and bore a distinguished part in the battle of Waterloo. He is one of those military men whom his government are in the habit of sending to places where they consider a soldier's information may be made available. In this instance, the choice of the French minister may be considered doubly fortunate, inasmuch as Madame la Comtesse is a military woman in every sense of the word. Herself and her sister, the Demoiselles Fering, animated with the glorious desire of serving their country in arms, enlisted as privates in Dumoriez' army. They bore a distinguished part in the very first engagement, where they fought amongst the bravest: shortly after which they rose from the ranks, and obtained commissions. The sister of the ambassadress was killed at the battle of Valmy. One of the two, I know not which, received a sword of honour for her chivalrous conduct. In the feminine manners of her Excellency, it is difficult to trace the gallant hussar of the early times of the French Revolution.—The same.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

SOLITUDE.

High on the bare bleak hills the shepherd lies,
Watching his flocks which spot the green below;
Above him spread the gray and sullen skies,
And on the mountains round the unbroken snow.
What voice instructs him there?—The winds that blow.
What friend has HE?—His dog. Yet with these twain
He grows a prophet of the frost and rain,
And well the fox's cunning learns to know.

There lies he, and through coming years must lie,
More lonely than the lonely hills; for they
Have mute companions, like themselves in form.
But he must live alone till life decay,
See nothing save his dog, his flocks, the sky,
Hear nothing save the old eternal storm!

SLANDER NOBLY REBUKED.—The absurd story, now that Cranmer had so much influence with the king, of his being the hostler at the Dolphin, was revived. A priest, in the north of England, hearing the commendations of the archbishop that now reached the remotest part of the kingdom, observed to others who were delighted with them, "Why make ye so much of him? He was but a hostler, and hath as much learning as the goslings of the green that go yonder." To Cromwell these words were reported by those who resented them. The priest, in consequence, was summoned before the council in London, but not at the suit, nor at the time, with the knowledge of the archbishop. He had to ponder upon his folly some weeks in the prison of the Fleet; and then he besought Cranmer to release him from his confinement, and the charges occasioned by it, not without acknowledging his sorrow for the unjust language he had used. Cranmer therefore sent for him, and the dialogue commenced. "Did you ever see me before this day?" said the archbishop. "No," the priest replied. "Why then did you mean to deface me among your neighbours by calling me a hostler, and reporting that I have no more learning than a gosling?" The priest answered "that he was overseen with drink."—"Well then," continued Cranmer, "oppose me now to know what learning I have: begin in grammar, if you will, or else in philosophy, or other sciences, or divinity."—"Pardon me," said the bewildered ecclesiastic, "I have no manner of learning in the Latin tongue, but merely in English."—"Then allow me," replied Cranmer, "if you will not oppose me, to oppose you. You read the Bible?"—"Yes, daily."—"Then who was David's father?"—"I cannot surely tell your grace."—"Then if you cannot tell me that, yet tell me who was Solomon's father?"—"I am nothing at all seen in these genealogies," the priest finally replied. Cranmer now reminded him of the crew to which he belonged, "who know nothing, and would know nothing, but sit on an ale-bench, and slander all honest and learned men." He dismissed him to his cure, bidding him learn to be an honest, or at least a reasonable man; and not to suppose his sovereign so absurd as to have sent a hostler on an embassy to an emperor and to the bishop of Rome. Cromwell had urged the archbishop to severer measures. I expected, said he, that this priest should have recanted at Paul's Cross. To another ecclesiastic, who had been imprisoned by Cromwell for a similar offence, the lenity of the archbishop also was shown, in desiring that he might be released, although he concealed not the contempt in which he held the slanders of such persons: "for surely of all sorts of men, I am daily informed, that priests report the worst of me; and therefore so to be reported of by a priest, it should very little grieve me."—Todd's Life of Archbishop Cranmer.

A HAPPY INSTANCE OF PRESENCE OF MIND.—It has been related of him (Celio Secundo Curio, a distinguished reformer, in the time of Cranmer), that when pursued by the familiars of the Inquisition at Rome, he was sitting at dinner in an inn; and that a captain of the papal band, called in Italy, Barisello, suddenly making his appearance, commanded him, in the Pope's name, to yield himself as a prisoner; Curio, despairing of escape, rose to deliver himself up, unconsciously retaining in his hand the knife with which he had been carving. The Barisello, seeing an athletic figure approaching him with a large carving-knife, was seized with a sudden panic, and retreated to a corner of the room; upon which Curio, who possessed great presence of mind, walked deliberately out, passed without interruption through the midst of the armed men, who were stationed at the door, took his horse from the stable, and made good his flight.—M'Crie's History of the Reformers in Italy.

LESSONS IN BOTANY.

NOW that the Spring is approaching, the leaves about to spread, and the buds to blossom; now that the vivifying influence of the season excites the mind and the body to new exertion, and Nature is daily discovering new beauties, far better studied in their original freshness than in the wisest books, the writer of this advertisement is willing to remind young ladies residing in or near to the metropolis, that no season can be more favourable for the commencement or resumption of the study of plants, and that she continues to give BOTANICAL LESSONS to young ladies, at their own residences, on Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays.

MISS KENT is too much flattered by Mr Loudon's approbation, to deny herself the pleasure of quoting the favourable opinion expressed in the 'Gardener's Magazine' for February last;—"Miss W. D. is recommended to Mrs Withers, who, in botanical and fruit painting, is our 'beau ideal;' and so is Miss Kent as a teacher of botany for ladies."

The study of Botany is much easier than appears to those who have not attempted it. With a few books and a very little assistance, (or, if our love of flowers be very great, from our books only) we may soon learn to discover the genus of flowers, and, ere long, to distinguish their species. Let any one who is fond of flowers, make the experiment; it may be made at very little expense: any of the English Introductions to Botany, Smith's English Flora, and a botanical microscope will suffice for the commencement. We should add, perhaps, a little tin case, in which to bring home and to preserve the plants, until they can be examined at leisure. Oh, what delight does the young botanist experience, when he first ascertains a plant by his own observation of the natural characters! With what interest is every new flower added to his store of knowledge! and, when more advanced, and the common plants of the neighbourhood have become familiar, how welcome is the sight of a plant that he does not know; what ecstacy if it be a rare one! what consciousness of wealth in the daily increasing herbarium! The herbarium is a thing of course, for every young botanist whose love of flowers is genuine, will be earnest to preserve specimens of the plants he examines; to serve at once as trophies and memorials.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

The Romance of History. France. By Leitch Ritchie. Second Edition. In 3 vols. 8vo. Bull.

[Concluded from Saturday.]

We omitted to mention in our last, that Mr Ritchie, at due chronological intervals in his three volumes, has given us brief, but spirited and sensible sketches of the historical periods contemporaneous with the stories which he has founded upon them. The reader has seen occasional passages from these sketches in the miscellaneous department of our journal, and they will furnish us more. Of the romances, we proceed to conclude our notice by making a few more such extracts as may serve to shew the various powers of Mr Ritchie's pencil. We begin with one of his loving heroines, ripening from the girl into woman, and introducing a pleasing moral fact, which the author, out of a just regard for it, has marked in Italics:—

'She felt, she knew, that it was to her Amauri looked for the reward of his valour;—she felt and knew it; for she was a woman, and had a woman's heart, and a woman's eyes. Suitors came—noble, rich, and valiant—and they departed as they came. Summer after summer passed away, and the playful graces of early years ripened into the full, majestic loveliness of womanhood. The frolic laugh subsided into the "rich and melancholy smile;" and the voice, losing its high and gleesome tone, as if bent down by a load of sweetness, learned to thrill, when it had forgotten to pierce. She was on the verge of twenty. It is no idle superstition which tells that lovers, who are destined to love long, grow in the course of time to resemble one another. The characters assimilate; and expression, which is the reflection of character, proclaims, of natural necessity, that they have done so. Adelaide's mind raised itself to the pinnacle on which her soaring imagination had placed Amauri, and loving greatness, she herself became great to reach it.'—P. 95.

Here follow some good dints of blows, made by this worshipped lover, during a combat with a jealous desperado:—

'The young knight abandoned a trial of strength in which he had no chance of success, and while skilfully avoiding, or warding off the blows of the banneret, only sought opportunities to wound him through his armour by repeated thrusts. The hoarse and constrained voice in which his invocations were made the while, proclaimed the deadliness of his purpose, and the force which he exerted at every stroke. "Ha! St James! Ha! St Michael! Ha! St George!" cried he, as if from the bottom of his bowels, while driving each time the point of his sword against the enemy.'—P. 120.

Our hero (for this is all in the same story, 'The Pilgrim of St James') saves a fair young Saracen from violation during the Crusades, and is nursed by her during a delirium which results from his efforts. She has fallen in love with him. The rich retreat, in which he finds her on awaking to reflexion, the circumstances indicated by the disorder of the precious furniture, the approach of the damsel to look upon him, (seeming to increase the richness of the air), and the superstitious fancy which comes over him at the conclusion, are all equally well-imagined and painted. (Too much praise, by the way, cannot be given to the management of the incident of the ring in this story, though we cannot well bring it into our quotations):—

'When his soul again awoke, the scene had changed. The whole had vanished like a hideous dream, which we only remember in a vague impression of hate and horror, while the details of the circumstances are completely lost. He was lying extended on a couch, so soft that it hardly seemed to be woven of the gross objects of touch. Some low and shadowy tones of music, faint, but not distant, dropped with monotonous sweetness upon his ear. The air was rich with perfume, pungent, however, rather than heavy; and the wounded man felt every moment more strongly the efforts of the principle of life as it rallied within him.

'At length he was able to turn his head upon the pillow, and looked round upon a scene, which he half imagined to lie in the many mansions of eternal bliss. The first object which dissipated this thought was a large golden crucifix lying broken, and trampled on the ground; and the Pilgrim of St James, with holy horror attempted to sign the cross upon the coverlid, as he muttered an anathema against the authors of the sacrilege. Other articles of riches, also, but more apparently of the East than of the West, cumbered the apartment. Bale was piled upon bale of cloths of gold, silver, and silk, and skins of vair, ermine, gris, and other valuable furs; and vases of precious metals, candlesticks, and candelabras, splendid dresses, and other articles of luxury and magnificence, lay scattered in confusion around. The place was lighted by a single lamp of massive gold, fed with perfumed oil; and on the side next the couch, the flame was shaded by a fan made of the plumage of the bird of paradise. Everything testified enormous wealth but also, fear, haste, and confusion; and when at length Amauri's senses, accommodating themselves to the scene, were able to take cognizance of the want of windows, both in the walls and roof of the apartment, and of a dull and indefinite, but unequal, sound, rolling, as if at a distance, above, he perceived that he was in some place of subterranean refuge, excavated for the protection of the lives and riches of a native family of distinction.

'Presently the door opened, slowly and noiselessly; and shading a taper with her hand, a female form appeared, that might more easily have been imagined to be that of a denizen of the heaven of Mohammed, than one of his votaries on earth. She was just on that threshold of time by which the girl steps into womanhood; and in her virgin eyes might be read the troubled spirit of her years, when the young heart, trembling, half with hope and half with fear, looks back with joy and yet regret, and forward with distrust, mingled with delight.

'Her unveiled face, without one vestige of colour, was fair to a marvel, while that of a European, in such circumstances, would have been merely pale; and yet it was impossible to say in what the delicate difference consisted, or in what way the warm blood of the East manifested itself to the eye without the sensible presence of colour. She extinguished the taper, and walked on tip-toe towards the couch. While she moved, Amauri imagined that he felt the approach of the lovely vision in the increasing richness of the air, which oppressed him even to faintness, and he fixed his feeble eyes on her face till they ached with beauty.

'She bent down over the couch; but the lids of Amauri's eyes closed beneath her gentle breath, and she imagined him to be still senseless or asleep. How long she gazed in his face, he did not know; for a kind of intoxication came over his senses. She was no longer a living denizen of the earth that bent over him, but a phantom-shape, whose beauty had budded in Paradise. Sometimes he detected a strange resemblance to Adelaide in the face which he now saw only with his mind's eye; and sometimes a more real likeness of the shrieking female whom he had endeavoured to preserve, brought back upon his soul confused associations of strife and pain. But over all was thrown, singularly mingled with his other imaginations, an undefined feeling of religious horror; and at length, as his faculties became more unsettled, he believed himself to be in some idolatrous temple, where the goddess herself, with her foot on the sacred crucifix, attempted to win him from his salvation with the smiles of her immortal beauty.'—P. 153.

Here followeth a queen of the "good old times;" rather different from one who goes to church in a modern bonnet, and takes the first pew that comes. The "drab," as Swift would have called her, in his pulling-down style, was Isabel, wife of Charles VI. A young soldier, the hero of the Magic Wand, has missed his way in the Château de Vincennes, while in search of the governor, and bolts into a private room:—

'A lady, apparently approaching towards middle life, was standing at one of the windows in close conversation with a stout, coarse, ill-favoured man, considerably advanced in years. The latter turned round in angry surprise, at the abrupt entrance of a stranger; and the former, drawing up haughtily, fixed upon him a pair of still brilliant eyes, which darted daggers of pride and fierceness. Alain stopped in confusion, but returned the look of undisguised curiosity. A hundred struggling recollections shot dark and formless through his brain; he was sure that he had seen the face before, and he felt that it was associated with ideas of grandeur and magnificence. At length, as the truth suddenly flashed upon him, by a kind of instinctive impulse, his head sunk upon his breast, and his knee touched the floor, for he knew that he was in the presence of the Queen of France.

'Isabella, without replying in the slightest manner to his homage, continued her haughty inspection, as if he had been some strange animal, of a low and disgusting species, that had dared to crawl into her presence; but the governor of the château, for such was his degree, strode up to Sir Alain, and in a harsh and rude voice inquired who he was, and what he wanted.'—P. 86.

Madame de Maintenon, Louis the Fourteenth, and the Illustrious Vatel, the cook.—In the story of The Black Mask, or the Lottery of Jewels.—Frederic is a lover of Madame de Maintenon, when she was simply Françoise d'Aubigné. He suddenly encounters her in one of the green alleys of Versailles, at the time she was meditating a conquest of the king. She is masked. Struck by something which he discerns in her deportment, he requests, while assigning a good reason for taking the liberty, that she will permit him to see her face:—

'Françoise, after a moment's hesitation, removed her mask; and Frederic started back, like one who has cast suddenly upon the noon-day sun a look which had been accustomed to dwell on its dawning brightness. Her beauty had reached the precise point of maturity beyond which is decay, however gradual, and before which is unripeness, however bewitching. Time had just touched the portrait sufficiently to mellow the expression, without robbing the tints of one ray of brilliance. Her dark eyes were full of soul, where before there had been only fire; and her lip, which was wont to move and glisten, was now tranquil and almost heavy, as if slumbrously enjoying its own velvet richness.

'There was a lurking beam of triumph notwithstanding, which Frederic discovered in those beautiful eyes, schooled to mildness both by feeling and sorrow; and while he gazed, a slight but scarcely perceptible curl of the lip might have indicated to a closer observer the existence, however momentary, of that feeling of pride, unallied to greatness, which agitates the breast of beauty at the spectacle of some deep and unequivocal devotion to her charms. But if such feelings really existed, they soon fled, at least in their external phenomena; and, with a look and tone of kindness which went to the heart of the listener, she addressed him in one of the forms of salutation used by old acquaintances on their meeting again on the earth.

'"It is then, indeed," said she, "my early friend! How fares it with you in your pilgrimage? What prize have you drawn in the lottery of the world?"

'"Françoise," said Frederick, "it fares not well with me; and as yet I have drawn nothing but blanks—blanks—blanks. You, too, have been unhappy, if I must believe report, in spite of which that face is radiant with beauty and content. You were left in poverty, they say, by your husband; and you solicited in vain from the king a continuance of his small pension."

'"It is true," replied Françoise calmly; "but I have now obtained my wish. The amount is trifling, yet adequate to my desires."

'"My success," said Frederic, seizing her hand as if by an uncontrollable impulse, "small as it is, has perhaps been greater than yours. Françoise, it is my firm belief that, but for one of the most trivial circumstances in the whole catalogue of human events, you would have been at this hour a sharer of my fortunes, be they what they may! Tell me, thou whom I have never ceased to love since your beauty first made a heaven of my heart ———"

'"Hush! hush! hush!" cried Françoise, "this is madness!" and, withdrawing her hand and her eyes, she retreated some steps from her lover. The next moment, however, her eyes rested again upon him, and with a glance filled with almost tender hesitation; but suddenly, as a sound met her ear in the distance, she looked hurriedly along the path, and her expression altered. Her eyes waxed bright, her cheeks flushed, her lips grew rigid, and her whole frame seemed to expand.

'Frederic followed the direction of her look, and saw advancing, at some distance, a man whose air, by its extraordinary assumption of importance, conveyed at first an idea almost of the ludicrous. As the stranger came nearer, however, his majestic and noble-looking person, rendered graceful in him what in any other would have seemed the effect of an eccentric vanity; and even the loftiness of his figure, and the breadth of his shoulders, conspired, as it were, to give warrant for a dignity of deportment, just touching upon extravagance. His limbs were exquisitely well turned,—a circumstance which the fashion of his clothes rendered sufficiently obvious; and the delicate conformity with which they were adapted to a body which no one could have pronounced to be either too stout or too slender, gave an unusual air of finish to the portrait. His hair was black, and his lips florid and singularly bright. His glance was irresistibly penetrating, and, together with his lofty presence, had the effect of intimidating the person he looked at. For the rest, he was marked, but slightly, with the small-pox; and his face, upon the whole, although exhibiting a fair proportion of good features, was rather commanding than handsome.

'Before Frederic could note all these details of a figure which seemed at once to attract and overawe scrutiny, Françoise had moved hastily away. Her lover followed, half in shame and half in indignation; but striking smartly the arm of a man who passed at the moment—

'"M. Vatel," said she, "I am surprised! This gentleman has been complaining that there was no such thing as roti at the supper-table!" She then walked on, and the person addressed stood still, bending a glance of horror and amazement upon the chevalier.

'The dignified stranger by this time passed by; and Frederic saw him, as he reached Françoise, who appeared to have slackened her pace, put his hand to his hat. Presently, he seemed to recognise her, and stopping to speak, he uncovered quite, and stood with his hat in his hand.

'"Sir, what gentleman is that?" asked the Chevalier, addressing the person whom Françoise had called M. Vatel.

'"No roti!" ejaculated he in a voice of despair—"Sir, may I solicit the honour of your permission to enquire whether you did not jest with the lady?"

'"Tell me first who that gentleman is, and I will then answer your question."

'"Pshaw! that is only the king.—Did you actually say no roti?"

'"The king! The widow Scarron! The poultry-girl!"

'"N— n— no roti?"—P. 304.

We conclude with a striking account of the nocturnal military expedition to the Hague, across the ice:—

'An expedition of a very singular and daring description was now planned by General Luxembourg; and Frederic eagerly enlisted himself as a volunteer, partly in the idea that their march might be through Bodegrave, and partly excited by the romantic nature of the enterprise. On a dark and freezing night, the General collected his troops, to the number of 12,000 chosen men, the whole being provided with skates, and they set forth over the ice to surprise the Hague. When they left Utrecht, it was clear frosty weather, and the effect of the moon and stars upon the even sheet of ice, over which they swept like a breeze, was truly magical. By degrees, as they advanced, the visible horizon was obscured by vapour, and they could see nothing around, above or beneath them, but a circular expanse of ice, bounded at the edge by thick grey clouds, and canopied by the starry curtain of the sky.

'The strange groaning sound which ever and anon boomed along the frozen wilderness, had at first something inexpressibly terrific to the imagination; and as it died fitfully away in the distance, the space around them seemed extended almost to infinity. The sky at length was gradually covered by the vapours rising, as if from the edges of the circle of earth: a veil of dull and hazy white o'erspread the heavens and obscured the stars; and a dim round spot of watery brightness was the only indication of the site of the moon, by which alone they could now steer their course.

'A rapid thaw had come on; their skates sank deeper and deeper into the ice at every sweep; and at last, the water gathering upon the surface, as it was agitated by the night wind that had now risen, assumed the appearance of a sea. The wind increased; the sky grew blacker and blacker; their footing became more spongy and insecure; they plunged almost to the knee; and the ice groaned and cracked beneath them. Everyone looked upon himself as lost; and the horrors of a fate hitherto untold in story, and appearing to belong neither to the fortunes of the land nor of the sea, appalled the boldest imagination.

'At length a faint twinkling light appeared in the distance, sometimes seen, and sometimes lost, in the varying atmosphere; and they had the satisfaction, such as it was, of at least knowing the relative bearings of the place on which they were about to perish. The light proceeded from a strong fort in the enemy's hands, impregnable without cannon; and what added bitterness to their misery was the knowledge that beyond this fort was a dyke, which in all probability afforded a path, however narrow and muddy, by which they could have returned to Utrecht. The fort, however, was the gate to this avenue of safety, and, even if they had possessed the requisite means of siege, if it was a single day, they would either be swallowed up by the waters, in the continuance of the thaw, or perish miserably through cold and fatigue.

'But anything was better than inaction. The water creeping insidiously around them was a deadlier enemy than stone walls or cannon-shot; and they determined, at least, to make a rush upon the immoveable masonry of the fort, and provoke the fire of its defenders. It is impossible to account for its result. It may have been that the sight of so large a body of men, rushing in upon them, as if from the open sea, their numbers multiplied, and even their individual forms distorted and magnified in the mist, struck a panic terror into the hearts of the garrison; while this may have been encreased by the shouts of courage or despair, booming wildly over the icy waste, and mingling like the voices of demons with the rising wind. But, however it was, the gates of the fort opened at their approach, and the helpless and half-frozen adventurers rushed in without striking a blow."—P. 315.

STRANGE GROUNDS OF DIVORCE.

The Bulgarian marries very young, the wives being from twelve to thirteen years of age. In the villages, the Bulgarian couples pass their lives very amicably together; but in the larger towns, such as Adrianople, they divorce on the slightest pretence; and I must be excused for saying that it is by the ladies that these divorces are generally desired. They very often occur six weeks after marriage. A short time before we came to Adrianople, a very pretty young woman had offered her services to Mrs Duveluz. She said that she had been just married to a man who had promised her a ferigee (a sort of loose cloak) but, added she, "he is a poor wretch, and cannot perform his promise; so I shall get divorced, as I can gain nothing by remaining longer with him."—Major Keppel's Journey across the Balcan.

EXTRACTS FROM NEW BOOKS.

AN EXTRAORDINARY ESCAPE.

Two men of the name of Roux, father and son, who are still living, and are employed in the navy-office at Toulon, were condemned to death after the evacuation of that place by the English, on pretence of having betrayed the interests of France. They were, with 900 others, ordered to be shot at a place called le champ de bataille. Without being made to undergo any form of trial, without even having had an opportunity of being heard in explanation of their conduct, they were torn from the bosom of their family, and taken to the place of execution. When all the intended victims were placed in a heap in the middle of the plain, several field-pieces, loaded with grape-shot, were brought up close to them, as well as a regiment of cavalry, and one of infantry, which were to charge those whom the cannon had not already destroyed, and finish them. The two Roux had been separated from each other. The son, fearful lest the discharge of cannon should not despatch him with sufficient speed, placed himself as much forward as he possibly could. He was so close to the battery, that when the guns went off, the power of the explosion knocked him down. That instinct which impels mankind to the preservation of life, made him feign that he was dead when the cavalry were ordered to charge. A dragoon gave him a sabre cut, which made a large though not dangerous wound in his back. The infantry came after, and one of the soldiers, perceiving that young Roux had not ceased to breathe, gave him a violent blow on the head with the butt-end of his musket, which so completely stunned him, that he lay for several hours senseless on the ground. The slain having been left on the champ de bataille, to be all removed the next morning for interment, were soon stript of their garments by the liberated prisoners of the bagnio, and all left nearly naked. During the night, young Roux gradually recovered the use of his senses. It was with the utmost difficulty that he called to memory what had occurred. The horrors of the day presented themselves at last fully to his mind. He rose to quit, if possible, this scene of death, and it was then that he perceived he was naked and covered with blood. He sought to find some garments among the dead, by whom he was surrounded, and in his efforts to take off from the body of one of the unfortunate men some clothes which had escaped the pillage, he found that life was not extinct in him. The desire of saving a fellow-creature prompted every means that could bring timely relief, and they were not used in vain. The joy and surprise of both may be easily conceived, when they discovered that they were the father and son. They alone had escaped the carnage! It was with difficulty they could procure sufficient clothing from among the surrounding victims of this act of unheard-of atrocity, in order to withdraw from the horrid scene. Fortunately for them, no sentinel had been stationed to watch over this field of butchery, and the Roux returned without any obstacle to their house. It was with the utmost difficulty they obtained access to it. At that time of night the afflicted family did not suppose that they were roused for any other purpose than that of furnishing new victims to the bloodthirsty agents of anarchy and destruction. No words could express the sensations of the wife and children on beholding again those whose supposed destruction had plunged them into grief and despair. Their wounds were immediately dressed, and before daylight they retired to their country-house, situated a league in the interior of Provence, where they remained concealed until the "reign of terror" was no more, and the cannibals of the south had ceased to have their day. They then returned to Toulon, to the amazement of their friends and acquaintances, many of whom, could not, for a long time, persuade themselves that they were not the ghosts of the two men who had been included in the massacre of the champ de bataille. These two men to this day live, esteemed and respected by their fellow-citizens, by whom the particulars of their most fortunate escape are not forgotten.—Journal of a Nobleman.

A MELANCHOLY STORY.

At the foot of the mountain was formerly situated the chief château of a rich palatine, who, after having followed the King John Sobieski to Hotimm and Kaminieck, and assisted in delivering Vienna from the danger of falling into the hands of the Turks, being satiated with glory, and wearied with the toils and fatigues of war, retired to his estate in this neighbourhood, to enter on a life of uninterrupted repose. Soon after, he took it into his head that, by making choice of a wife among his own vassals, he should meet with a partner in life whose habits of submission and feelings of gratitude for raising her to so exalted a station, would render her a more eligible partner in life, than one taken from among his equals in rank. He therefore assembled all the young girls residing on his estates, and selected one who, besides being the handsomest, appeared to possess other qualities of an attractive kind. Vauda (so she was called) could not refuse to accede to her master's wishes; but her heart was by no means free. A young gardener of the château had long before possessed himself of it: nor was Severin less passionately attached to Vauda than she was to him. It was in vain that they both endeavoured to subdue a sentiment which could no longer lead to their mutual happiness. Severin frequently brought flowers to his mistress, and would hardly venture to look her in the face on presenting them. Vauda pitied him, and still loved him; but in the hope that absence would cure them both of their hopeless passion, she requested her husband to appoint him to the stewardship of another of his estates, situated in a distant part of the country. The interest evinced by Vauda in favour of a simple gardener raised some suspicion in the mind of the palatine. He watched their motions, and when Severin came to take leave of his mistress, and knelt to kiss her hand and express his gratitude, he was surprised in that attitude by the palatine, who, rushing into the room with his sabre unsheathed, laid his wife lifeless at his feet. He then attacked the young gardener, who in vain had exerted himself to arrest his fury. After many blows, which did not succeed in depriving him entirely of life, the arrival of attendants, attracted by the noise, checked the palatine's fury, and arrested his arm. After recovering a little from the weakness produced by his loss of blood, Severin required the attendance of a priest, to whom he made a solemn declaration of his innocence, and likewise that of Vauda. After the palatine's fury had subsided, remorse took possession of his soul, and the innocence of Vauda became every day more evident to him. The scene of his rashness incessantly revived recollections which disturbed his conscience, and he resolved on a pilgrimage to Rome, in the hope of obtaining forgiveness for his crime. This was extended to him on condition that he would found a convent near the spot where the guilty act was committed, and consign himself to perpetual seclusion in it, by adopting a monastic life. These terms were very exactly complied with by the palatine, who not only enriched the convent by the gift of some valuable estates, but bequeathed to it all his property at his death. It therefore became one of the richest convents in Poland.—Journal of a Nobleman.

RUSSIAN SUPERSTITIONS.

They (the inhabitants of Glaskoft) have the character of carrying the superstitious notions common in Russia, to a greater extreme than they are found elsewhere. They abstain from smoking, because the Scripture has said that there is more evil in what comes from the mouth, than what enters it. Nothing would induce them to eat pigeons, because the Holy Ghost is represented under the shape of a dove. A friend is never asked for salt at table, because if he forgets to smile on offering it, a quarrel is sure to take place soon after. Monday is a day on which no undertaking is commenced. God chose it as the first of the world's creation, and as man sinned, it has become an unlucky day. — Journal of a Nobleman.

TURKISH HONESTY.

The conveyance of specie is solely intrusted to the Tartars, not one of whom has ever been known to be robbed; and, though I have made frequent inquiries, I have never heard of any man so employed, that betrayed his trust. The following anecdote relates to the Turk or Tartar in charge of the post. It should be premised, thas all commercial transactions between Turks and English are carried on without any written documents; a proof of the mutual confidence they repose in each other's honour, more especially when it is considered that experience has taught both these nations to have no dealings with Greeks, without receiving all the security that writing can give. In the winter of 1828, the Turkish postman was sent to some distant part with a considerable quantity of specie. The money is carried in bags, which the merchants call groupes. They are given to the postman, and, as I have just mentioned, without receiving any written document as proof of the receipt. This man, on returning from his journey, was applied to by a French house for 15,000 piastres, (a sum at that time equal to £250.) He made no attempt at evading the demand, but immediately said, "I have doubtless lost the groupe, and must therefore pay you as soon as I can raise the money. After maturely thinking of the loss, he returned by the same road, quite confident that, if any Mussulman should find the money, it would be returned to him. He had travelled nearly the whole distance, when he arrived, in a very melancholy mood, at a small, miserable coffee-house, where he remembered to have stopped a few moments on the road. He was accosted at the door by the café-jee, a Febek, who called out to him, "Hallo, sherif! when you were last here, you left a bag, which I suppose to contain gold; you will find it just where you placed it." The postman entered, and discovered the identical groupe, evidently untouched, although it must have been left exposed to the grasp of the numerous chance customers of a Turkish café.

Mr Charles Whittall, the gentleman with whom I resided while at Smyrna, told me that, a short time before, he had engaged a poor Turk to carry specie, amounting to 500*l*. The man, on his return, said, "I have delivered the money, but the correspondent says that, as he had written so lately, he did not think it necessary to write by me." A short time after, Mr Whittall received a letter to say that the money had not reached its destination. Suspicion fell on the Turk, who was found and informed of the circumstance: he asked leave to go in search of the money, begging only that he might be paid equivalent to the day's work (some few piastres) he should lose in the journey. On inquiry, he discovered that a Greek had appropriated the money to himself, having been in immediate want of it. The moment he called upon this person, he was paid back the five hundred pounds, and was given two thousand piastres, which he accepted, but instead of appropriating it to himself, paid it, as a matter of course, together with the original sum, into the hands of Mr Whittall's broker, and it was with difficulty he could be persuaded to retain the Greek's fee.—Major Keppel's Journey across the Balcan, &c.

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

TRANSMUTATION OF METALS.—Our modern quacks equal the ancient alchemists in their pretensions, and really surpass them in their power of transmuting metals. In the process of making Singleton's eye-ointment, viz. mixing one dram of red precipitate of mercury with seven of butter, one penny is metamorphosed into one guinea—the cost and the selling price of the same quantity of this most precious nostrum!—Scientific Gazette.

ARCHBISHOP CRANMER.—Severe only to himself, he was as unwearied in his attention to business as in his pursuit of learning. His time was thus employed: at five o'clock he usually rose, and till nine continued in his study; after breakfast, part of the morning was spent in business, public or private; at eleven was the chapel-hour; at twelve the call to dinner; after which he devoted an hour to conversation with his friends, or to the amusement of the chess-board. Again to his study he then resorted, until the evening chapel-bell rang at five; and after the service, he usually walked till six, which was the hour of supper, when he took little, often no refreshment; then from seven to eight again walked, gave the next hour to his books, and at nine retired to his bed. Fox relates that the archbishop always accustomed himself to read and write in a standing posture; esteeming constant sitting very pernicious to a studious man. Of his domestic habits, and private character, all that we know is amiable. As a master he was much beloved. His hospitality and charities were great and noble, equal to his station; greater often than his ability. We have witnessed him almost always poor; for his generosity to strangers, as well as his countrymen, was boundless. His hospitality, indeed, we have seen suspected; but we have also seen it vindicated. Among other instances of his charity, he is said to have fitted up his manor-house at Bekesbourne in Kent, for the use of wounded soldiers, who should be landed on the southern coast of the island, supplying it with a physician, a surgeon, nurses, and everything proper as well for food as medicine; and the patients, on their recovery, with money to convey them to their homes. To the establishment of hospitals indeed, as well as grammar-schools, his was the noble wish to have seen a very extensive appropriation of the alienated monastic revenues.—Todd's Life of Archbishop Cranmer.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

The sight of the hand-writing of R. H. gave us great pleasure; but we are unable to admit a communication such as he was good enough to send us, for fear of bringing upon ourselves the necessity of noticing all similar meetings and the subjects connected with them; which would make a new department in our paper, at present beyond our power to contemplate. NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

The Life and Writings of Henry Fuseli, Esq. M.A. R.A. Keeper, and Professor of Painting to the Royal Academy in London; Member of the First Class of the Academy of St Luke at Rome. The Former written, and the Latter edited by John Knowles, F.R.S. Corresponding Member of the Philosophical Society at Rotterdam, his Executor. In 3 vols. 8vo. Colburn and Bentley.

If the saying hold true in Switzerland as in England, "Once a clergyman, always a clergyman," Mr Fuseli ought to have been called the Rev. Mr Fuseli, for it seems he was originally in holy orders, and preached in many of the pulpits of Zurich.

Mr Fuseli was born in that city, on the 7th of February 1741. His father, like himself, was a painter distinguished for his literary attainments. The son was bred up for the church, took his degree of Master of Arts, entered the profession he was designed for, joined with some friends, among whom was Lavater (afterwards the celebrated physiognomist) in exposing the practice of an iniquitous magistrate, and was advised, in consequence, to retire with them from the city. After visiting several places in Germany, where he became acquainted with Armstrong, then physician to the British forces, he was constituted by some of the literati of that country and Switzerland a sort of agent for the establishment of a literary intercourse with Englaud. He came over accordingly, in the year 1763, in the train of Sir Andrew Mitchel, who had been Ambassador to Prussia, and who introduced him to several persons with whom he remained intimate during their lives,—among others to Mr Coutts the banker, and to Mr Johnson, the late estimable bookseller in St Paul's Church-yard.

To economize, as well as to be near Mr Coutts, who then lived in St Martin's lane, he took lodgings in Cranbourne street, then called Cranbourne alley. His complexional vehemence is well seen in an anecdote related of him at this period. He was no sooner settled in his lodgings, than he wrote to his father, and then issued forth in a solitary state of mind, in search of a post-office.

'At this period,' says Mr Knowles, 'there was much greater brutality of demeanour exercised by the lower orders of the English towards foreigners than there is at present. Meeting with a vulgar fellow, Fuseli enquired his way to the Post-office, in broad German pronunciation; this produced only a horse-laugh from the man. The forlorn situation in which he was placed burst on his mind; he stamped with his foot, while tears trickled down his cheeks. A gentleman who saw the transaction, and felt for Fuseli, apologised for the rudeness which he had received, explained its cause, and told him, that as a foreigner he must expect to be so treated by the lower orders of the people: after this he shewed him where he might deposit his letter. This kindness from a stranger in some degree restored tranquillity to his agonized feelings.—Vol. I. p. 30.

Our adventurer, not choosing to be under the pecuniary obligations that were offered to him, got his living by translating for the booksellers. He was introduced to Smollett, for one of the early editions of whose Peregrine Pickle (now a very scarce one) he made several drawings; and he knew poor Falconer, the author of the 'Shipwreck,' who was then allowed to occupy apartments in old Somerset House, and whom he represented as a mild inoffensive man, unhappy from pecuniary embarrassments.

Fuseli, from an early period, had shewn a great propensity to drawing. He is said to have acquired the power of painting with his left hand, as well as his right, from using it for that purpose by stealth, while his father thought he was listening to the reading of sermons. A Society for the Promotion of the Fine Arts being now just established in England, Fuseli devoted all his leisure hours to etching and drawing, and commenced a connection with arts and artists, which ended in making him what we have seen. He fell in love with Angelica Kaufman; and, according to Mr Knowles, Miss Mary Moser, the flower-paintress, since better known as Mrs Lloyd, ell in love with Fuseli. We recollect Mrs Lloyd, a lively, chatty old lady, who would probably have made him a good wife. There is a letter to him from her, in Mr Knowles's book, which, under the circumstances, gave us not only a lively, but a touching idea of her manners and disposition. Mr Knowles tells us, that the feelings which Miss Moser entertained for Fuseli, she flattered herself were mutual; but he says, that "if Fuseli ever had any affection for this lady while he was in England, it was soon dissipated by the change of scene, and the pleasures he pursued while in Italy."

In 1766, Fuseli became travelling tutor to Lord Chewton, afterwards Earl of Waldegrave, and went with him to France, but soon returned, having so far resented his pupil's impatience of restraint, as to give him a severe blow. The father, who probably had experienced some trouble himself from the young gentleman, acquitted the tutor of blame; but Fuseli's family, and most of his "friends," blamed him highly for an imprudence, which ruined his prospects in such a quarter. Fuseli used to say, in after life, "The noble family of Waldegrave took me for a bear-leader, but they found me the bear."

Resolved now to devote himself to painting, our hero went to Italy with Armstrong, whom he had met at the table of Mr Coutts. Both the poet and the painter were irritable: they quarrelled on board ship about the pronunciation of an English word, Fuseli provokingly maintaining, that a Swiss had as much right to judge of English pronunciation as a Scotchman; and at Genoa, which was the place they landed at, they parted. At Rome, having previously changed his family name of Fuessli, to Fusseli, he finally altered it to Fuseli, "to accommodate it," says Mr Knowles, "to the Italian pronunciation." How Fuseli was more accommodated to the Italian pronunciation then Fusseli, does not appear. The Italians admired him, and said he was another Michael Angelo. "As a nation, however, says Mr Knowles, he was not partial to the modern Italians, who, he said, were "lively and entertaining, but there was the slight draw-back of never feeling one's life safe in their presence." This he exemplified by the following fact "When I was one day preparing to draw from a woman selected by artists for a model, on account of her fine figure, on altering the arrangement of her dress, I saw the hilt of a dagger in her bosom, and on enquiring with astonishment, what it meant, she drew it and quaintly answered, "Contro gl'impertinenti." (For the impertinent). Possibly this was a joke, a preconcerted plan to alarm Fuseli. At all events, if it tells against the Italians in the old way, it might have said something for them in a new one with a clergyman.

In returning from Italy, Fuseli visited his native place, and fell in love with the daughter of a magistrate. The father thought him too poor to marry her, and thus drove him back to England, "almost in a state of frenzy." These words, however, are to be taken cum grano. Mr Fuseli was accustomed to be in a state of frenzy. He appears to have damned and cursed from a very early period, considering he was a clergyman. Miss Moser, in the postcript of her letter to him, though a fair and anxious correspondent, expresses her belief, that he will exclaim or mutter to himself, "Why did she send this damned nonsense to me!" We have seen that a horse-laugh at him in the street, made him stamp with his foot, and shed tears of vexation. And in a letter to Mr Northcote from Lugano, he says, "At the sound of Rome, my heart swells, my eye kindles, and frenzy seizes me." Furthermore, he speaks of his "boiling brains."

On returning to London, Fuseli resided at No. 100, St Martin's lane, and practised chiefly as a portrait painter. Mr Coutts thought he had been wrong in his quarrel with Armstrong, and advised him to go and make it up with the poet, especially as the latter was dying. Fuseli went immediately. 'On sending up his name, he was admitted almost immediately into Armstrong's bed-chamber. The poet, however, could not restrain his naturally sarcastic humour, and the following dialogue took place:—Armstrong: "So you have come back?" Fuseli: "Yes, I have come home." Armstrong: "Come, you mean, to London! 'the needy villain's general home:' however, (putting out his hand) "I thank you for this visit; you find me in bad plight; but I am glad to see you again." After this salutation they conversed amicably; but the Doctor did not long survive the interview.

We are sorry the biographer has no more to tell us of Armstrong. Though a man of less pretension, he was of a genius less likely to perish than his hero. We have heard Fuseli's habit of swearing attributed to his example; but his own weakness was probably the cause of it. We never knew anybody with the habit of swearing, in whom it might not be traced to some weak point in the character.

Mr Fuseli now set up for an historical painter, and became much admired for his fancy pieces. He still, however, adhered to his love of books and scholarship, and had attained such knowledge of the language of his new country, as well as of Greece, that, to the great admiration of Cowper (whom it is singular that he never saw, then or afterwards), he corrected, in the manuscript, the translation of Homer by that poet. Among other friends, about this period, he was made acquainted with Mr Bonnycastle, who became an old crony of his, with Mr Lock of Norbury Park, with Mr Roscoe, who was very kind to him, and gave him many orders, and with Dr Moore and his family. He remained very intimate to the last, with the Moores. Mr Roscoe and Mr James Carrick Moore, are perhaps the two friends, who cut the most agreeable figure in this biography, always excepting Miss Moser, who with a blind fondness, told Angerstein that Fuseli's were the best pictures in his gallery, —and Lady Guildford and her daughters, who petted him like affectionate kinswomen. We must not forget, however, Mr Johnson the bookseller, who, the more one knows of him, becomes the more respected. In order to enable Fuseli to live while he projected the Milton Gallery, he proposed to be one of three friends, who should support him for three years, at a hundred a year. The three friends became six, at fifty pounds each. They deserve to be mentioned, wherever this circumstance is alluded to. They were Messrs. Johnson, Seward, George Steevens, Lock Roscoe, and Coutts. The Milton Gallery, though containing some of his best pictures, did not succeed: but it got him into the Royal Academy, which ultimately did for him all that an Academy can do for any man; gave him a house and salary, and employment from those who require the stamp of authority upon what they respect. Nay, it did more: the Academicians, not being very learned Thebans, were proud of having such a scholar among them, and he finally held the united offices of Keeper and Professor.

Just after this period, he became acquainted with Mrs Wollstonecraft, of whose singular regard for him, and the circumstances connected with it, Mr Knowles tells the story as follows:—

'The talents of Mrs Wollstonecraft were first brought into notice by the Rev. John Hewlett, who, to forward her views in getting employment by writing on literary subjects, introduced her to Mr Joseph Johnson, bookseller, in St Paul's Church yard. The house and purse of this liberal man were always open to authors who possessed talents, and who required pecuniary assistance; and such being the case with Mrs Wollstonecraft, she was a frequent visitor at Mr Johnson's: there Fuseli met her; but as he was not very ready to make new acquaintances, and was not only a shy man, but had rather a repulsive manner to those he did not know, so it was some time before they became ultimately acquainted.

'The eyes of all Europe were at this time fixed upon the passing events in France. That spirit of liberty inherent in the Swiss, now burst forth in Fuseli; and he considered, as did his friend and countryman, Lavater, that an opportunity was then offered to mankind to assert and secure their liberties, which no previous period in the history of the world had afforded. The same feelings animated the bosom of Mrs Wollstonecraft. This was kept up, and indeed, heightened by her then daily occupation,—that of translating from the French the political pamphlets of the day, which at this time met with a ready and rapid sale; and in writing criticisms on them, as well as upon other subjects, in the Analytical Review.

'Congruity of sentiments and feelings upon points which occupied the thoughts, and engrossed the conversation of persons in all ranks and stations of life, naturally brought about a closer intimacy between Fuseli and Mrs Wollstonecraft, the consequences of which were not foreseen by the lady; for she little thought that the attachment on her part, which proceeded from it, would be the cause of her leaving this country, and thus becoming an eye-witness of the system of Gallic liberty, which she had attempted to uphold, emanating, as it did, from philosophers, being destroyed by murderers and madmen.

'Mrs Wollstonecraft had the strongest desire to be useful to her connexions and friends; and she began her career in life by sacrificing her feelings and her comforts to what she fancied purity of conduct, and the benefit of others. It was a favourite consideration with her, that she "was designed to rise superior to her earthly habitation," and that she "always thought, with some degree of horror, of falling a sacrifice to a passion which may have a mixture of dross in it."

'Having a face and person which had some pretensions to beauty and comeliness, Mrs Wollstonecraft had been frequently solicited to marry; but previously to her acquaintance with Mr Fuseli she had never known any man, "possessed of those noble qualities, that grandeur of soul, that quickness of comprehension, and lively sympathy," which she fancied would be essential to her happiness, if she entered into the marriage state. These she found in him; but there was a bar to all her hopes in this quarter, for he was already married to a woman whom he loved.

'For some years before their acquaintance, with the view of usefulness which she had prescribed to herself, Mrs Wollstonecraft read no book for mere amusement, but studied those works only which are addressed to the understanding; she scarcely tasted animal food, or allowed herself the necessaries of life, that she might be able to pursue some romantic scheme of benevolence; seldom went to any amusements (being resident chiefly at Bath, and in the midst of pleasure), and her clothes were scarcely decent in her situation of life. The notions of privation, which some of the revolutionists in France were now endeavouring to inculcate, rather encreased than diminished this tendency in Mrs Wollstonecraft, and Fuseli found in her (what he most disliked in women) a philosophical sloven: her usual dress being a habit of coarse cloth, such as is now worn by milk-women, black worsted stockings, and a beaver hat, with her hair hanging lank about her shoulders. These notions had their influence, also, in regard to the conveniences of life; for when the Prince Talleyrand was in this country, in a low condition with regard to his pecuniary affairs, and visited her, they drank their tea, and the little wine they took, indiscriminately, from tea-cups.

'Fuseli had a talent for conversation peculiar to himself, and his knowledge of the classics, of literature in general, and of the fine arts, was extensive, and his memory so retentive, that he seldom forgot what he had read or seen; these, aided by a great power and fluency of words, a poetical imagination and ready wit, enabled him at all times to put even a known subject in a new light. Talents such as these, Mrs Wollstonecraft acknowledged she had never seen united in the same person, and they accordingly made a strong impression on her mind. "For," said she, "I always catch something from the rich torrent of his conversation, worth treasuring up in my memory, to exercise my understanding." She falsely reasoned with herself and expressed to some of her intimate friends, that although Mrs Fuseli had a right to the person of her husband, she, Mrs Wollstonecraft, might claim, and, for congeniality of sentiments and talents, hold a place in his heart; for "she hoped," she said, "to unite herself to his mind." it was not to be supposed that this delusion could last long. From an admiration of his talents, she became an admirer of his person, and then, wishing to create similar feelings in Fuseli, moulded herself upon what she thought would be most agreeable to him. Change of manners, of dress, and of habitation, were the consequences; for she now paid more than ordinary attention to her person, dressed fashionably, and introduced furniture somewhat elegant into commodious apartments, which she took for that purpose.'

'But these advances were not met with the affection which she had hoped to inspire in Fuseli,—for he admired her chiefly for her talents; and in the warmth of her disappointed feelings she constantly vented complaints of being neglected. These availed so little, that sometimes when Fuseli received letters from her, thinking they teemed only with the usual effusions of regard, and the same complaints of neglect, he would allow them to be some days unopened in his pocket.'

'The tumult which was raised in her mind by conflicting feelings having love for the object, and yet the wish that her affection should be so regulated as to be strictly within the bounds which she had assigned to love, that of "strength of feeling unalloyed by passion," injured in a degree her health, and unfitted her for those literary pursuits which required a more than ordinary exertion of the mind. For more than twelve months "she wrote nothing but criticisms for the Analytical Review;" and even these, which required but little exertion of the talents she possessed, would not have been written, but for her daily necessities. Fuseli reasoned with her, but without any effect, upon the impropriety of indulging in a passion which took her out of common-life. Her answer was, "If I thought my passion criminal, I would conquer it, or die in the attempt. For immodesty, in my eyes, is ugliness; my soul turns with disgust from pleasure tricked out in charms which shun the light of heaven."

'At length Mrs Wollstonecraft appears to have grown desperate, for she had the temerity to go to Mrs Fuseli, and to tell her that she wished to become an inmate in her family; and she added, as I am above deceit, it is right to say that this proposal "arises from the sincere affection which I have for your husband, for I find that I cannot live without the satisfaction of seeing and conversing with him daily." This frank avowal immediately opened the eyes of Mrs Fuseli, who being alarmed by the declaration, not only refused her solicitation, but she instantly forbade her the house. No resource was now left for Mrs Wollstonecraft but to fly from the object which she regarded: her determination was instantly fixed; she wrote a letter to Fuseli, in which she begged pardon "for having disturbed the quiet tenour of his life," and on the 8th of December 1792, left London for France.

'Shortly after her arrival in Paris she again wrote to Fuseli, gave him her opinion of the state of public feeling at that important period of the revolution, and implored him to write to her occasionally. As this letter was not answered, all communication on her part during her residence abroad ceased.

'The cause of Mrs Wollstonecraft's protracted stay in France,—for she intended, prior to her departure from England, to have remained there only six weeks,—and the attachment which she formed while in Paris, are foreign to this memoir; besides, if they were not, it would be unnecessary now to detail them, as they have been long before the public from the able pen of him who afterwards became her husband.

'After an absence of nearly two years and a half, Mrs Wollstonecraft returned to London (in April 1795); and on her arrival called upon Fuseli: the reception which she met with, it is presumed, was not very grateful to her feelings, for she shortly after wrote him the following letter:—

'"When I returned from France, I visited you, sir; but finding myself, after my late journey, in a very different situation, I vainly imagined you would have called upon me. I simply tell you what I thought, yet I write not, at present, to comment on your conduct, or expostulate. I have long ceased to expect kindness or affection from any human creature, and would fain tear from my heart all its treacherous sympathies. I am alone. The injustice, without alluding to hopes blasted in the bud, which I have endured, wounding my bosom, has set my thoughts adrift into a ocean of painful conjectures. I ask impatiently what—and where is truth? I have been treated brutally, but I daily labour to remember, that I still have the duty of a mother to fulfil.

'"I have written more than I intended,—for I only meant to request you to return my letters: I wish to have them, and it must be the same to you. Adieu.'" '"MARY.'"

'"Monday morning.—Mr Fuseli.'"

'All communication ceased between the parties from this time, until after Mrs Wollstonecraft's marriage with Mr Godwin. Fuseli noticed this occurrence, in a letter to a friend, in the following terms: "You have not, perhaps, heard that the assertrix of female rights has given her hand to the balancier of political justice.

'Fuseli saw Mrs Godwin but seldom; he dined only once at her table. Indeed, this lady did not live long to enjoy the happiness which she had pictured to herself, in being the wife of a man of genius and talents, for she died on the 10th of September 1797, after having given birth to a female child,* who has proved herself, by works of the imagination, to be worthy of her parents. Fuseli could not but feel much regret on the occasion, but as "grief does not give utterance to words," so he barely noticed the catastrophe, in the postcript of a letter to Mr Roscoe, in these terms,—"Poor Mary!"'—P. 161.

We shall leave this story to the reader to make what conclusions from it he pleases, with one or two observations:—the first is, that whoever becomes acquainted, for the first time, with the treatise of Mrs Wollstonecraft on the Rights of Women, is startled to find, that instead of being as lax as she is supposed to be on the subject of female manners, she carries her notions to a pitch of the austere; though, undoubtedly, she deceived herself, in thinking she could draw the Platonical line in this business, between theory and practice. Secondly, we must observe, that Mrs Wollstonecraft's regard for such a man as Fuseli, might itself have told her, that it was far from being so Platonical as she imagined: for Mr Fuseli's ideas of women, and of the passion of love, were certainly of no very refined order, as may be seen from the bold and meretricious figure they cut in his pictures: nor does he appear advantageous in his treatment of women; not even in our opinion, in this story; nor in any other that we have read of. Mr Fuseli was right and wise, we think, for the good of all parties, in opposing the arrangement meditated by his admirer; but nevertheless, as a gentleman, and as the person admired, he should not have sneered at her. He should not have designated her, in his letter to a friend, as "the assertrix of female rights:" nor should he have "petulantly" said to her, the only time that he dined with her after her marriage, and when she had asked him to join at her table, Horne Tooke, Curran, Grattan, and two or three other men of "that stamp" who happened to talk too well for him,—"I wonder you invited me to meet such wretched company."

HIGH VOICES.—The Spaniards were particularly celebrated for the extraordinary height of their falsettos, and were sought after to sing the upper parts. They were succeeded by the artificial soprani, whose race, it is to be hoped, is well nigh extinct. The last falsetto Spaniard of the pontifical chapel, Giovanni di Sanctos by name, died 1625; and the first soprano, Padre Giroamo Rossini, was admitted in 1601.—Harmonicon for April.

EXTREME VERACITY OF THE PITCAIRN ISLANDERS.—George Adams, having no wife to detain him, but, on the contrary, reasons for wishing to employ his thoughts on subjects foreign to his home, was very anxious to sail in the Blossom; and I would have acceeded to his wishes, had not his mother wept bitterly at the idea of parting from him, and imposed terms, touching his return to the island, to which I could not accede. It was a sore disappointment to poor George, whose case forms a striking instance of the rigid manner in which these islanders observe their word. Wives upon Pitcairn's Island, it may be imagined, are very scarce; as the same restrictions with regard to relationship exist as in England. George, in his early days, had fallen in love with Polly Young, a girl a little older than himself; but Polly, probably at that time liking some one else, and being at the age when young ladies expectations are at the highest, had incautiously said, she never would give her hand to George Adams. He, nevertheless, indulged a hope that she would one day relent; and to this end was unremitting in his endeavours to please her. In this expectation he was not mistaken; his constancy and attentions, and, as he grew into manhood, his handsome form, which George took every opportunity of throwing into the most becoming attitudes before her, softened Polly's heart into a regard for him, and, had nothing passed before, she would willingly have given him her hand. But the vow of her youth was not to be got over, and the love-sick couple languished from day to day, victims to the folly of early resolutions.—Beechey's Voyage to the Pacific, &c.

DRURY-LANE.

LAST night the theatres produced their Easter spectacles,—almost the only remnant now existing of the old shews at this season of the year: for the diffusion of polite knowledge has put an end to the Lord Mayor's Ball. The usual critical respect for the elder house led us to Drury Lane first, where the new piece is called The Ice-Witch, or the Frozen Hand. It is founded upon a favourite subject of the old romances, that of a hero carried away by an enchantress into a bower of bliss. The ices of the north made no difference in this respect. They were easily thawed by love and imagination. We fancy we have met with the Frozen Hand before, perhaps in Mr KEIGHTLEY'S Fairy Mythology. If it is Mr BUCKSTONE'S own invention (for he is the author) it does credit to his fancy.

Harold, a King of the Sea (Mr H. WALLACK), is locked with his crew among the northern ices, where Druda, the Witch of the Region (Miss FAUCIT), falls in love with, and detains him. His followers all die with the exception of his henchman, Magnus Snoro (Mr HARLEY), who, as servants always follow suit on these occasions, is beloved by the witch's lady's maid, Norna (Miss PHILLIPS). Both the gentlemen have mistresses at home, to whom, by dint of the fine bowers and feasts with which they are tempted, they prove unfaithful: but as the master, in the greater gentility of his engagements, wishes, like Ulysses, to return to his promised Penelope, the witch gets angry, and under pretence of a salutation at his departure, inflicts upon him a Frozen Hand. This hand is to be the death of anybody that touches it.

Meantime, Ulla, the Sea-King's mistress (Miss CRAWFORD) and Minna her attendant (Mrs WAYLETT) are carried away from their abode by a rival; but have a consolatory dream, in which the God of the Sun appears to them, and promises them aid in their greatest extremity. Harold, on his return, has a combat with his rival, the prize of which, it is agreed, shall be the lady. Harold conquers, but is assailed by treachery; upon which he makes use of the Frozen Hand, of which he had disdained to take advantage before; and the rival is slain. But how is he to receive the hand of his bride? The spectator easily settles this by saying, "with the other hand,"—and "after explaining the nature of the sorcery practised upon him." And to receive her he accordingly consents in that manner; but unluckily the Sea-King's friends have a horror of sorcery, and the witch has also threatened to be with him at his marriage, and is as good as her word. She appears, to the consternation of the beholders, and orders him to put forth his left hand. This she forces into the hand of his bride, and the latter falls. The God of the Sun, however, comes at the last extremity, and is too much, as might be expected, for the Witch of the Ice; and so they all live very happy after. We must not forget, that Magnus Snoro has a minor infliction of the refrigerating faculty, proportionate to his rank; which is evinced, to the great amusement of the audience, by his striking cold his mistress, and every other woman who approaches him; he, Magnus, having been previously famous for his exploits the other way.

This piece is very good of its kind, with some beautiful scenery by Mr STANFIELD and others, some tasteful music selected and composed by Mr T. COOKE, and some pretty dances by Mrs BARRYMORE. One of these movements, in particular, where the dancers come forward, pretending to lay their hands upon one another's arms, and lifting them back again, is extremely pleasing, and so far as we recollect, new. A pretty allegory seemed intended by the faithless lovers, who freeze their mistresses: but the physical allegory of the Ice and the Sun interferes with it. The dialogue is trite; but HARLEY is very quaint and superfluous in the servant. ☞

INCONSISTENCIES OF STAGE COSTUME.

TO THE TATLER.

SIR,—It is rather surprising, that among the many improvements the Stage has undergone of late years, one striking defect should have been overlooked; I allude to the manner of dressing the male characters of genteel comedy, and the superhuman difference they make in the respective ages of old and young: for instance, Sir Anthony Absolute, Old Hardcastle, &c. appear in coat, breeches, wig, and buckles, the style of which is at least that of forty or fifty years ago; while the younger characters, such as Charles Surface, Hastings, and Marlow, in the same comedies, are attired in the last new fashion of the present day. The same remarks, I think, will apply also to the ladies. If the old characters are always to be dressed in the costume of the period in which the play was written, why should not the younger ones be made to correspond? Does it not appear ridiculous that a stage old gentleman should, by the antiquity of his dress, be made almost a hundred years the senior of his son or his nephew? I think, with submission, your rod would be of infinite service in bringing about a reform in this particular.

Your sincere admirer,

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

The Life and Writings of Henry Fuseli, Esq. M.A. R.A. Keeper, and Professor of Painting to the Royal Academy in London; Member of the First Class of the Academy of St Luke at Rome. The Former written, and the Latter edited by John Knowles, F.R.S. Corresponding Member of the Philosophical Society at Rotterdam, his Executor. In 3 vols. 8vo. Colburn and Bentley.

In 1802, Fuseli went to Paris during the peace, to see the Louvre, where he justly found fault with the French artists for having retouched some of the pictures of the old masters. He found David, the painter of the Reign of Terror, with a hare-lip. He declined the offer of an introduction to the First Consul, probably because he thought he should not know how to behave himself in the presence of a greater man than himself.

In 1803, he left Queen Anne street (now Foley place) where he had lived some time, and took a house in Berners street, No. 13, which had been built by Sir William Chambers for his own residence, and where he remained till the December of the next year, when he was elected to the office of Keeper of the Royal Academy, which gives the holder of it apartments in Somerset House. He continued here till the close of his life, much respected by the Students and others, for his understanding, but not so much so either for his pictures or manners; and after out-living most of his old friends, died, in the 85th year of his age, on the 16th of April 1825, at Putney Hill, the seat of the Countess of Guildford, who, with her daughters, affectionately attended him to the last. The Countess of Guildford was the daughter of his first patron, Mr Coutts. The Academy gave their old officer a public burial at St Paul's.

'It may now be proper,' says Mr Knowles, 'to give some description of Fuseli's person and habits. He was rather short in stature, about five feet two inches in height, his limbs were well proportioned, his shoulders broad, and his chest capacious. His complexion was fair, his forehead broad, his eyes were large, blue, and peculiarly expressive and penetrating; his nose large, and somewhat aquiline; his mouth was rather wide, and although his features were not strictly regular, yet his countenance was, in the highest degree, intelligent and energetic; the expression of his face varied in a remarkable manner with the impressions of his mind. He was clean and neat in his person and dress, and very particular with his hair, which was carefully dressed every day with powder.

'In youth, Fuseli was exceedingly temperate in all his habits: until the age of twenty-one years, he had never tasted fermented liquors; and in more advanced age, his usual beverage was port wine in a moderate quantity, or port wine mixed with water; and during the whole of his life he had never even tasted beer. He was habitually an early riser. In London, during the summer months, he usually left his bed-room between six and seven o'clock; but when in the country, he arose between four and five. To these, and to the practice of standing while he painted, he attributed the more than usual good state of health which he had enjoyed. He possessed his faculties in an extraordinary degree to the last period of his life: his fancy was vivid, his memory unimpaired, and his eye-sight so good, that he could read the smallest print without the aid of glasses: if any one of them had failed, it was his hearing; but this, if impaired at all, was only so in a slight degree; and, in my opinion, his complaint of this proceeded more from an inattention on his part, to any discourse which did not interest him, than from a defect in the organ; for, when his attention was drawn to a subject, or excited, this was in no degree apparent.'—P. 350.

'Notwithstanding some eccentricities, Fuseli was a man of method: his daily occupations, which were almost unalterable, will give some notion of this. If the weather were favourable, he usually walked for an hour or two before breakfast, if otherwise, he read some classic author. At breakfast, (which generally occupied an hour), he was engaged in looking over drawings of entomology, or in reading some book on that science. After he had breakfasted, and while under the hands of the hair-dresser, he read Homer in Greek. At half-past ten o'clock he went to his study, and engaged himself in painting until four, then dressed, and walked till the time appointed for dinner. In the evening, if not in society, he amused himself in examing prints, executing drawings, or reading the popular works of the time. When out of London, the middle of each day was spent either in drawing, writing or reading.

'From infancy, Fuseli possessed very impetuous passions, which required, when a boy, some degree of coercion on the part of his parents, to control. This irritability in one instance nearly cost him his life. At Lyons, when a young man, he had a dispute with a person which aroused his feelings to such a height, that in a momentary fit of passion, he made use of that agility which he possessed in a considerable degree, and kicked his antagonist in the face. The man coolly drew his sword, and immediately inflicted a severe wound upon the offending leg. Notwithstanding this violence of disposition, when his anger was aroused to a high pitch, a kind word or look appeased him in a moment. In the several relations of husband, friend, and master, he was most affectionate and kind; but he required to be sought: if neglected, he ceased to think of the objects whom he had before loved and esteemed; and his constant theme was, on such occasions, "I can live without them who can do without me."

'He possessed such a degree of pride and self-love in this particular, that if he thought himself slighted, he would resent it, whatever might be the rank or condition of the man: this has been witnessed on several occasions, one of which now recurs to my memory. I accompanied him to a private view of a picture. 'The Trial of Queen Caroline:' after we had been in the room a few minutes, he pointed out a clergyman, and said, "That is Horsley, the Bishop of London; he and I were very intimate. Before he became a dignitary of the church, he used to come to my house frequently, and sit there for hours together; but for some years he seems to forget even my person." Shortly after Lord Rivers came into the apartment, and accosted Fuseli in his usual jocular manner, and perhaps not knowing that he had been acquainted with the Bishop, took an opportunity of introducing him. Fuseli immediately said, "I have seen his Lordship before now," and turned upon his heel."—P. 353.

After speaking of his scholarship, which was great and various, his extensive acquaintance with English poetry and literature, his knowledge of history, chronology and entomology, the love for which branch of natural history was a family passion, Mr Knowles proceeds as follows:—

'It must be acknowledged, that Fuseli was fully sensible of his various acquirements, and never underrated his own powers; although apt to undervalue those of others, particularly of some of his brother artists, and also to speak of them slightingly, because they were unacquainted with literature, and even deficient in orthography: after talking with them, he has said, "I feel humbled, as if I were one of them." Mrs Wollstonecraft was alive to this weakness in Fuseli's character, and on one occasion emphatically exclaimed, "I hate to see that reptile Vanity sliming over the noble qualities of your heart." '—P. 363.

* * * * * * *

'Fuseli seldom or never concealed his sentiments with regard to men, even to their faces. Calling upon him one evening, I found Mr Marchmont and Mr Nollekens in his room: although I was well known to these gentlemen, he formally took me up to them, and said, "This, Mr Knowles, is Mr Marchmont, that, Mr Nollekens, two of the cleverest artists, in their way, I believe, in Europe, but in everything else two old dandies." Every one knows, who is acquainted with art, the powers which Northcote displays when he paints animals of the brute creation. When his picture of 'Balaam and the Ass' was exhibited at the "Macklin Gallery," Northcote asked Fuseli's opinion of its merits, who instantly said, "My friend, you are an Angel at an ass, but an ass at an Angel." '—P. 364.

At page 285, another anecdote is related of the airs he gave himself over his brother artists. When he put up for the office of Keeper of the Royal Academy, Northcote and Opie, who voted against him, considered it right to call upon him the day after his election, in order to explain their motives. This proceeding Mr Knowles gratuitously attributes to their "being conscience-stricken, not only on account of his abilities, but from having received favours at his hands." They may or may not have been conscience-stricken; but conscience also might have dictated their votes for another candidate; and we do not see why Mr Knowles should assume one case more than the other. To be sure, he says, that "in their explanation they in some degree blamed each other;" and it is possible, considering what is known of the jealousy of artists, that they might have voted against Fuseli, simply because he deserved the office better than their own man. Be this as it may, Fuseli was more than even with them, after his fashion. He told them that he was sorry they had taken the trouble to come to him, because he should lose his character in the neighbourhood: for, said he, "when you entered my house, the one must have been taken for a little Jew creditor (Northcote), the other for a bailiff (Opie); so good morning."

'Discoursing one day with a gentleman at Mr Johnson's table, upon the powers and merit of Phocion, a stranger, who had apparently listened with attention to the conversation, interrupted him with this question—"Pray, Sir, who was Mr Phocion?" Fuseli immediately answered, "From your dialect, Sir, I presume you are from Yorkshire; and if so, I wonder you do not recollect Mr Phocion's name, as he was Member for your County in the Long Parliament;" and he then resumed the discourse. Bonnycastle and another mathematician were conversing upon the infinite extension of space, a subject in which Fuseli could take no part, so as to shew his powers; he instantly cut it short by asking, "Pray, Gentlemen, can either of you tell me how much broad cloth it would take to make Orion a pair of breeches?" Calling one morning upon Mr Johnson, he found him engaged in bargaining with an author for the copyright of a book; after a time, the gentleman took leave; when he was gone, Mr Johnson said, "That is Mr Kett, and his work is to be called 'Elements of Useful Knowledge.'" "In how many volumes?" said Fuseli. "In two octavos," was the answer. "No, no, Johnson," said he, "you cannot be serious. The ocean is not to be emptied with a tea-spoon." Meeting with a gentleman in society who piqued himself upon his knowledge of poetry, and boasted of being thoroughly versed in Shakspeare, he exclaimed, in a sonorous tone,—

"Oh, for a Muse of fire that would ascend
The brightest Heaven of invention!"

"Pray Sir, do you happen to recollect where these lines are to be found?" He took some time to consider, and then answered, "Somewhere in Pope."—"I find you are well read in the poets," said Fuseli.—Discoursing with a lady upon sculpture, who was too well read in classics to be a subject of his mischievous pleasantry, he pretended to inform her of a fine bas-relief, which had been received by the Royal Academy, from Rome. "What is the subject?" she asked.—"Hector and Andromache," said he, "dashing out, against a wall, the little Astyanax's brains."—"Poh, why do you tell me such stuff?" asid she. "Aye! you may laugh," replied Fuseli, "but it would go down with many a one. I have often said such things in company without detection; only try it yourself at the next lord's house you may visit, and see how many fine ladies, and dandies, will detect you."'—P. 367.

'Of Dr Johnson, whom he sometimes saw at Sir Joshua Reynolds's table, he said, "Johnson had to a physiognomist a good face, but he was singular in all his movements. He was not so uncouth in appearance and manner as has been represented by some; he sat at table in a large bushy wig and brown coat, and behaved decently enough. On one occasion, the conversation turned upon ghosts and witches, in the existence of which he believed, and his only argument was, "That great and good men in all times had believed in them." My fingers itched to be at him, but I knew, if I got the better of the argument, that his celebrity was so great, it would not be credited.—You know," he continued, "that I hate superstition. When I was in Switzerland, speaking with Lavater, upon the appearance of the spirit after death, it was agreed between us, that if it were allowed by the Deity to visit earth, the first who died, should appear to the other. My friend was the most scrupulous man in existence, with regard to his word; he is dead, and I have not seen him."—Of Sterne, he said, that "he was a good man, knew what was right, and had excellent qualities; but was weak in practice. When I was invited to meet him at Johnson's, I expected to hear from the author of 'The Sentimental Journey,' (which I esteem the most original of books), either wit, or pathos, or both; when I saw him, he was certainly nearly worn out, and I was miserably disappointed, as nothing then seemed to please him but talking obscenely."—The description which he gave of Sir Joshua Reynolds was, "that he had an insignificant face, but he possessed quickness of apprehension; he was no scholar, and a bad speaker. In his art, he took infinite pains at first to finish his work; but afterwards, when he had acquired a greater readiness of hand, he dashed on with his brush. "There is a degree of arrogance," said he, "in Sir Joshua Reynolds's portraits, for all his boys are men, his girls women. Sir Joshua, unassisted with a sitter, had no idea of a face; he copied nature, and yet there is a perfect degree of originality in his paintings; he had the affectation to deny genius." Of Gibbon he remarked, "that he had a good forehead, but a measured way of studying whatever he said."—Of Horne Tooke,—"Tooke is undoubtedly a man of talents; but he is the greatest chatterer I ever sat down with; one cannot, in his company, put in a word edgewise; he, however, wishes to be thought a good German scholar, but in this he is very superficial." He sometimes met Thomas Paine in society, and has remarked to me, "that he was far from being energetic in company; to appreciate his powers you must read his works, and form your opinion from them, and not from his conversation. Paine knew less of the common concerns of life than I do, who know little; for when he has had occasion to remove from lodgings, he hardly knew how to procure or make an agreement for others, and our friend Johnson latterly managed these concerns for him. When the popular cry was much against Paine, it was thought prudent by his friends that he should remove from his apartments; and others were taken for him by Johnson, about four miles distant from those which he inhabited. They went there in a hackney-coach, for such a vehicle could contain them, with all the moveables which Paine possessed. On their arrival at the new abode, Paine discovered that half a bottle of brandy was left behind; now brandy being an important thing to Paine, he urged Johnson to drive back to fetch it. "No, Mr Paine," said he, "it would not be right to spend eight shillings in coach-hire, to regain one shilling's worth of brandy." Paine was an excellent mechanic; when Sharpe was about to engrave my picture of the Contest of Satan, Sin, and Death, he employed a carpenter to construct a roller to raise or fall it at pleasure; in this, after several ineffectual attempts, he did not succeed to the expectations of Sharpe, who mentioned the circumstance in the hearing of Paine; he instantly offered his services, and set to work upon it, and soon accomplished all, and indeed more than the engraver had anticipated." '—P. 372.

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

— A Calcutta paper states, that the British resident at Ava is received into the houses of the Woongees and Athewoons with his shoes on. The first European who has been thus distinguished.

A Sufficing Reason.—A peasant in France was at a sermon on Good Friday, during which every one of the congregation shed tears as a matter of course. He alone remained unmoved. His neighbour, greatly scandalised at this breach of propriety, shook him by the sleeve, and asked him why he did not weep? "Why should I," answered the boor, "I do not belong to the parish!"—Journal of a Nobleman.

Handel and the Serpent.—While Handel was directing the rehearsal of one of his oratorios, the Revue Musicale tells us, he heard a gruff and unknown instrument among the bases. "What are those abominable sounds," he roared out, "which split my ears?"—"A serpent," some one replied. "A serpent!" growled the composer; "it does not seem to be that by which Eve was seduced." The story is as good as most things of the kind, but M. Fétis should have made a later composer the peg to hang it on. It is a pure anachronism; there were about as many serpents in England during Handel's time, as jupons in paradise on the day of Eve's nuptials.—Dilettante in Harmonicon for April Rapid Communication.—It is proposed, by means of a small tube throughout the length of the Liverpool and Manchester Railway, to convey information as quickly as in conversation. In Herschell's Treatise on Sound, it is stated, that in the cast-iron water-pipe at Paris the lowest whisper at one end was distinctly heard at the other, though a distance of 3,120 feet. The length of the longest tunnel of the Liverpool and Manchester Railway is about 6,600 feet; but it is thought that not only could articulate sounds be transmitted distinctly that distance, but through the whole length of the railway, which may be put to the proof.—Daily Paper.

A Convenient Talisman.—On my return to the khan I found Mustapha in great alarm, in consequence of intelligence he had received from a Nizam officer, that the Zebeks were in possession of nearly all the towns through which I had proposed to pass between Ghiediz and Smyrna. Now it was a secret that I had kept from Mustapha, and indeed almost from myself, that one of the objects of this journey had been to fall in with these Zebeks. The direct road to Smyrna, and that which was occupied by the Zebeks, lay in a westerly direction, through a small town called Ieni Kieu. To Ieni Kieu, therefore, I signified to Mustapha my intention of proceeding, and was not a little surprised when he assented. A little time solved the mystery: I had been travelling for two hours, with the compass in my hand, when I found that it continued to point always towards the north, which I knew could not be my course. I halted several times, and placed the compass on the ground; but still the direction was the same. In about six hours we came in sight of the snow-capped Olympus, which shewed me that my Tartar had been misleading me. I immediately told him, that by the little talisman I held in my hand I discovered that he had deceived me. It is curious, that though a native of Constantinople, and accustomed to Frank society, he was utterly ignorant of the properties of the compass; and at the end of almost every day's march he would describe to each new company the magic charm by which I could discover truth from falsehood.—Major Keppel's Journey across the Balcan.—[If such a talisman could be made, it would be hard to say whether execrations, or blessings, would be the more lavished on the inventor, but most assuredly he would make a rapid fortune.]

THE INDIAN SPARROW.—It seems that the pigeon is not the only letter-carrier of the feathered race, for it is said of the Indian sparrow, that "he may be taught with ease to fetch a piece of paper or any small matter that his master points out to him. It is an attested fact that if a ring be dropped into a dry well, and a signal be given to him, he will fly down with amazing celerity, catch the ring before it touches the water, and bring it up to his master with apparent exultation; and it is confidently asserted that, if a house, or any other place, be shewn to him once or twice, he will carry a note thither immediately, upon a proper signal being made." What an invaluable treasure must be such a bird to any unfortunate Miss Knibbs, who is reduced to the necessity of a clandestine correspondence with her lover!—Hard-hearted guardians should have an eye upon him, for he would assuredly be preferred to any other messenger;—not only for the romance of the thing, but for his sure secresy, and for his wings, which seem swift as even the impatience of love could desire. It seems, however, that he is in the habit of playing wicked tricks; for, Sir William Jones further tells us that young libertines train them to steal the plates of gold which the young Hindoo women at Benares wear between their eyebrows. Upon a given signal, they pluck these golden ornaments from the foreheads of the ladies, and carry them in triumph to their lovers. This is the bird of which it has been said that it illuminates its nest at night with fire-flies, which it affixes to the walls with clay. That the fire-flies are so placed, and at night, there seems no doubt, but naturalists differ as to the intention, and probably will continue to differ until the bird himself shall declare it. Some say it is for their light; others, that they feed upon these insects. Sir W. Jones leans to the latter opinion; but a letter from a gentleman, long resident in India, quoted in the "Architecture of Birds," favours the former, which is certainly the more agreeable notion, and would be as pleasing as it is poetical, could we, as Mrs Wakefield observes, divest our minds of the idea of the sufferings to which the brilliancy of the flies subjects them.

HIGH PRICE OF RANK.—"I suppose eggs must be very scarce in your neighbourhood?" said the Emperor Joseph to a Swiss peasant, who, having discovered his rank in spite of his incognito, had the impudence to ask twenty-five gold ducats for an omlet. "No, Sir," answered the Swiss knave, "eggs are not scarce, but emperors are very uncommon." Considering that the man had to deal with a crowned head, there is no wonder in his having sought to make the most of his eggs on that occasion. Although a far more humble individual, I remember a case very much resembling that of the omlet, which occurred to myself. Having one day halted at an inn in a small and unfrequented town in Champagne, I ordered a couple of mutton-chops, for which the hostess charged the modest sum of twenty-five francs! It was amusing to hear her enumeration of all the appendages to the mutton-chops, which I ought to have had. To sum up all, she said that travellers were so scarce that it could not be expected she should change a mere trifle, for one of my appearance! Of course I resisted the demanded with less good-humour than the Emperor Joseph might have done, and I got off by paying ten francs, about nine more than the regular price.—Journal of a Nobleman.

TENACITY OF LIFE IN A SNAIL.—The study of Natural History is well calculated to cure us of the habit of speaking of things as impossible, merely because they are strange. Travellers tell us few things more extraordinary than the fact that animals have been known to live months, and even years, apparently without food. Bingley speaks of a gentleman whose father, a fellow of the Royal Society, left him a small collection of fossils and other curiosities, which he had had in his possession many years; among them were a number of snail shells. About fifteen years after his father's death, this gentleman gave some of these shells to his little boy to play with. The boy put them into a bason of water, and the living snails were seen to come forth from them, after a confinement, not only of fifteen years, but also of those years in which they had been in possession of the collector. The number of years, however, is of little consequence:—that they should live twenty years is little more surprising than that they should live one.

TURKISH COURTSHIP.—When a Turk feels disposed to get married, he communicates his wishes to his mother or any other near female relative, to whom he gives a description of the kind of woman whom he would wish to make his wife. The lady applied to then sallies forth, accompanied by a host of female friends, to visit every house in the neighbourhood where young unmarried women are likely to be met with. Those who appear to answer the purpose undergo a thorough examination; their hair is regularly combed, to see that it is all their own; their mouths are opened, that it may be seen whether the teeth therein contained are the legitimate property of the jaws on which they appear; almost every part of the body is viewed, to ascertain whether it is not disfigured by any deformity; and finally, they are made to walk up and down the room, to shew that they are exempt from lameness. After these examinations, a faithful report is made to the proper quarter; the choice is fixed upon immediately, and the same messengers are sent back to make formal proposals. The special bearer of the commission appears, shod with slippers of two different colours; and this outward mark indicates at once the errand on which she has come. The other preliminaries are then speedily adjusted, and the nuptial-day fixed.—Journal of a Nobleman.

NEW FEMALE VOCALIST.—At a grand party given by the Duke of Devonshire, Miss Masson, an English lady possessing very superior vocal qualifications, and who, as an intimate friend of Madame Pasta, has been passing many months with her in Italy, benefitting by her example and instructions, [sang two airs in a manner that showed her own great talent, the result of long study, and the advantages she has reaped by her visit to the reigning queen of Italian song. Miss Masson is evidently an excellent musician, and mistress not only of the modern Italian style, but no less at home in oratorio and other sacred music. She sings Handel, Mozart, or Rossini, with equal and discriminating taste, and is decidedly an acquisition of great importance to the musical world at the present moment.—Dilettante in Harmonicon for April.

AN UPRIGHT JUDGE.—In the time of Judge Holt, there was a riot in London, occasioned by the practice of sending young persons to the plantations, who were confined in a house in Holborn, till they could be shipped off. Notice of the riot being sent to Whitehall, a party of the military were ordered out; but before they marched, an officer was sent to the Chief Justice, to desire him to send some of his people with the soldiers. Holt asked the officer what he meant to do, if the mob refused to disperse. "My Lord," replied he, "we have orders to fire upon them."—"Have you so?" said Holt; "then observe what I say. If one man is killed, I will take care that you and every soldier of your party shall be hanged. Sir, acquaint those who sent you, that no officer of mine shall attend soldiers; and let them know, likewise, that the laws of this land are not to be executed by the sword. These things belong to the civil power, and you have nothing to do with them." So saying, he dismissed the officer, proceeded to the spot with his tipstaves, and prevailed upon the populace to disperse, on a promise that justice should be done, and the abuse remedied.—Biographia Britannica.

COVENT GARDEN.

THE new Easter piece here, called Neuha's Cave, or the South-Sea Mutineers, is founded upon one of Lord BYRON'S failures, the Island, and is certainly no improvement upon its original. The striking adventure of the cavern under the sea is still to be found in its most interesting state where his Lordship met with it, in MARINER'S 'Account of the Tonga Islands.' Much of the Noble Poet's writing is said to be retained in the new piece. If so, it did not hinder us from wishing to go to sleep; an inclination which was so constant upon us, except when KEELEY was joking, that the reader must excuse our entering into the usual details. Sailors, bad verses, and the sight of poor Miss TAYLOR sacrificed over and over again to her melo-dramatic education, are too much for us all at once. Furthermore, we had sat out the new opera (of which we shall give an account to-morrow); and the whole series of tinkling, and glare, and noise, for five hours together, is really too excessive a case for anybody but a little boy who sits up on purpose. A man is not equal to it. There was a mutiny, and a ship's deck, and divers swaggering seamen, and South-Sea Islanders marching to grim music, or squealing, by way of a pleasing variety, and Miss TAYLOR aforesaid attitudinizing very prettily, and trembling with her fervid voice, and sundry pistols fired off, and a mate in a state of remorse, and KEELEY as a travelling gardener (the best thing in the piece), and finally, the wicked men are conquered, and the right gets the day, and bonnets and hats make haste to get out of the boxes.

We are surprised that the managers give us any more sailors. We have surely had enough of them. They force us to remember the saying of the wise man,—that the only thing which sailors have to do on shore, is to go to sea again. Certainly, if we have another batch of sea lingo and swaggering, we shall think that the managers are conspiring to sow the seeds of disaffection in the bosoms of his Majesty's liege subjects: for if anything could make us wish the death of our beloved Sovereign, it would be the advantage taken of his blue jacket, to overwhelm us with these eternal affectations of roughness and pigtail.

FATE OF THE 'HISTORY OF MUSIC.'—The fate of this work was decided like that of many more important things, by a trifle, a word, a pun. A ballad, chanted by a fille-de-chambre, undermined the colossal power of Alberoni; a single line of Frederic the Second, reflecting not on the politics, but the poetry of a French minister, plunged France into the seven years' war; and a pun condemned Sir John Hawkins's sixteen years' labour to long obscurity and oblivion. Some wag wrote the following catch, which Dr Callcott set to music—

'Have you read Sir John Hawkins' History?
Some folks think it quite a mystery;
Both I have, and I aver
That Burney's History I prefer.'

Burn his History was straightway in every one's mouth; and the bookseller, if he did not follow the advice au pied de la lettre, actually wasted, as the term is, or sold for waste paper, some hundred copies, and buried the rest of the impression in the profoundest depth of a damp cellar, as an article never likely to be called for, so that now hardly a copy can be procured undamaged by damp and mildew.—Harmonicon for April.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

The Pilot. By J. F. Cooper. 12mo, pp. 420. (First Volume of the Series called 'The Standard Novels.') Colburn and Bentley.

Caleb Williams. By William Godwin. 12mo, pp. 452. (Second Volume of Ditto.) Colburn and Bentley.

To have the 'Pilot' in one pleasant, thick, readable volume, price six shillings, is a good thing; and to have 'Caleb Williams,' is a better. We do not know how far the word Standard applies to the first novel, because it has not yet had time to stand for that period which is understood to confer the appellation. But we believe that the originality and truth of its sea-painting will enable it to do so. We know enough of the sea, and of the dangers of it, to take more than an ordinary interest in the most celebrated passage of this novel: and we have read few things that have left upon us a more lasting impression. We do not like the author's domestic painting so well, though always very clever, and often something higher, with the exception of his minuteness in painting costume, the common error of the followers of Sir Walter Scott, among whom Mr Cooper undoubtedly ranks the first, with a merit of his own, arising from the same local novelty. Sir Walter's details of costume are warranted, not only by his masterly mode of treating even those, but by the remoteness and peculiarity of the times and persons with whom they are connected. We cannot feel so much interest in the skirt of a modern coat, or the way in which a gentleman avoids sitting down upon it, even though the gentleman be Washington. Mr Cooper's women are proper cold cousins of Sir Walter's, with the melancholy advantage of impressing you as bearing greater resemblances to the understood character of American ladies, than Sir Walter's do, to our preconceptions, of the bonnie countrywomen of Burns and Ramsay. They seem like women in glass cases; and seldom shew themselves alive, but when they are taking upon themselves to rate and lecture their admirers. At least this was the impression made upon us by the perusal of several of Mr Cooper's novels, when they first came out; the present one, if we mistake not, in particular. We admire and love the American institutions: we look upon the people of the United States as our fellow-countrymen, and as having as much right as ourselves to whatever fame can be given them from the works and deeds of our common ancestors; nay more, for they have carried the hard-earned wisdom of those ancestors further than we; but at present, we regard their national reputation as too much modified by the commercial and sea-faring condition of their nonage: and without meaning any disrespect to Mr Cooper, himself a naval officer, we cannot help thinking that there is a certain want of refinement and liberal knowledge, arising out of the extremes of commercial timidity and marine license, in making women so strait-laced and precise, and afraid of committing themselves, as they appear in these novels. They seem like mere contradictions to the imprudence of prodigality, or the license of a sailor's hop, not substantial flesh and blood, honest-hearted womankind, with faith in themselves and others, and a merit beyond a pain of glass. For similar reasons, it always appears to us that Sir Walter Scott must have a gross idea of women.

'Caleb Williams' is a masterly work, of absorbing interest. We do not think the character of Falkland a very natural one; that is to say, we do not think that any man, not under the influence of physical madness, could commit the crime that he does; and yet have been accustomed from childhood to those habits of self-restraint and the most amiable virtue. There would have been overt acts of impatience and resentfulness, many times, in such a man; or else his virtue would have set most uneasily upon him. Falkland is no fool of virtue, whatever the author may sometimes appear to have intended him; but he may be allowed to be a sort of Sir Charles Grandison, taking himself for what he was not. He is Richardson's hero in miniature, under the sad disadvantage of having committed a capital offence! The less varnished characters in this novel, are admirably painted; Tyrrel, Grimes and all the rest, as far as we recollect them, for we have not seen the novel for many years, till it came before us in its present welcome shape; when we sat down incontinently, and read nearly seven chapters without being able to take our eyes from the book. This is the right thing. Criticism may or may not be all in an error. We think, however, it will be conceded, that Mr Godwin succeeds far better in moving by pain than by pleasure. His works are calculated to do more good to the unimaginative, than the reverse; or at least to those whose imaginations are not cultivated, and who are willing to have the rudiments of thought and feeling thrust upon them, at as much expense as the author pleases. We confess, for our own parts, we are among those who have had wounds enough, and are willing to have a little balm. We can dispense with being poked in the fifth rib, or taking our breakfast within hearing of the cries of a surgery. We think that the list of happy books might be encreased, without detriment to the salutary stock of dissatisfaction. But at the same time, we allow to the full, the merit of such works as 'Caleb Williams;' and having neutralized our criticism, by saying what we read of it again without stopping, we shall proceed to redeem our character for a masculine endurance, by saying that we shall infallibly read the whole volume through. Yes: we shall submit our scalp to Mr Godwin, so tempting is his tomahawk.

We missed, in this edition of the 'Pilot,' some account of the author; or a Preface of some sort, biographical, critical, or gossiping. Next to reading good books, we like to see them talked about. In the 'Caleb Williams' this want has been supplied by a critical preface, and a memoir. The latter, which is written in a strain of enthusiastic admiration, has been publicly mentioned, as from the pen of the author's daughter.

The new series of novels is unobjectionable in point of size and type; and we cannot but again express our satisfaction in having a whole novel in one volume. We have often taken a thick second volume in our pockets, in case we should finish the first during a walk; so that the reader may judge, perhaps from his own experience, how acceptable these comprehensive publications are to the lover of books, to say nothing of their cheapness, which is a recommendation to everybody.

But why do not Messrs Colburn and Bentley give us engravings more worthy of their publications? The vignette of the Ships in the 'Pilot' is very well, and the women in the frontispiece are, at any rate, not unlike those of the author; but the anonymous frontispiece in 'Caleb Williams' is deplorable, and the vignette still worse, as far as the female is concerned, though there is a character in the face of Grimes, which makes us regret that the drawing is so bad. The designs look like those of a young apprentice in the art. Messrs Colburn and Bentley's publications are so handsomely got up in every other respect, that we always regret this blemish upon them, and indeed are surprised at it, knowing, as we happen to do, that there is a gentleman in their establishment who has no ordinary taste in the Fine Arts.

The Life and Writings of Henry Fuseli, Esq. M.A. R.A. Keeper, and Professor of Painting to the Royal Academy in London; Member of the First Class of the Academy of St Luke at Rome. The Former written, and the Latter edited by John Knowles, F.R.S. Corresponding Member of the Philosophical Society at Rotterdam, his Executor. In 3 vols. 8vo. Colburn and Bentley.

[Concluded from Yesterday.]

The following characteristic anecdote of Fuseli and two of his friends, with the mixture of rage and good-humour at the conclusion, is very pleasant. Fuseli's answering the Eton boys in Latin, shewed a great ignorance of the English infant public, which has anything but a respect for those who think to "come over it" with their sympathies:—

'In the autumn of the year (1796) Mr and Mrs Fuseli, with Messrs Opie and Bonnycastle, passed a few days at Windsor; the object of the two artists was not only to have some relaxation, and to see the pictures, but to examine critically the cartoons of Raphael, which were at this time in the Castle. An anecdote or two will shew the disposition of the three men. In their journey down by the stage-coach, they were much annoyed by an outside passenger placing his legs over one of the windows. Opie at first gently remonstrated with him. This, however, not producing the desired effect, he pinched his legs, but yet the nuisance continued: at length the coach stopped at an inn, Opie, being enraged, exerted his Herculean strength, and pulled the person to the ground; but this did not produce any rencontre. When at Windsor, the two painters endeavoured to palm the scriptural subject of West upon Bonnycastle for the Cartoon of Raphael. But although he was not a competent judge of works of art, yet he was too well read not to detect their intentions. Bonnycastle, however, wished to shew his critical knowledge, and ventured upon the observation usually made upon the cartoon of the "Miraculous Draught of Fishes," that the boat was not sufficiently large for the men, much less for the lading. Fuseli instantly answered, "By G—d, Bonnycastle, that is a part of the miracle." Being at Windsor, they went to Eton College. Here the youths assembled about them, asking the usual questions—"Do you wish to see the library, Gentlemen," and such like. Fuseli amused himself by answering them in Latin; but Opie, in his usual gruff manner, said to the most prominent among them, "What do you want? I cannot make out to what class of being you belong, being too little for a man, and too large for a monkey." This was resented, as an insult, by the mass. And it was only by the great physical power of Bonnycastle and Opie, that they disengaged themselves and their companions from the crowd of boys who surrounded them. Fuseli was highly provoked, and was apprehensive also of personal violence; and when he got without the barrier, almost breathless with rage, he sat on a large stone by the side of the road, and exclaimed, "I now wish I was the Grand Sultan, for I would order my Vizier to cut off the heads of these urchins, from the rising of the sun until the going down thereof." '—P. 194.

'Of masquerades, he considered that Englishmen neither possessed the animal spirits, nor the quickness of repartee, requisite for this amusement, but are apt to drop the fastidious character they assume, and take up their real one. He instanced this by the following anecdote:—"At the request of young Lavater, when he was in England, I visited a masquerade at the Opera House: we were accompanied by my wife, and Mrs Wollstonecraft, and were endeavouring to be amused by the masks, when a devil came hallooing about us, and tormented some of the party to such a degree, that I exclaimed, 'Go to Hell!' but the dull devil, instead of answering in character, 'Then I will drag you down with me,' or making some bitter retort, put himself into a real passion, and began to abuse me roundly. So I, to avoid him, retired from the place, and left the others of the party to battle it out." '—P. 380.

Of Fuseli's religion, Mr Knowles does not know what account to give; nor did he himself. He had, however, a great admiration of the Bible, and seldom took it up, says Mr Knowles, "which he frequently did, without shedding tears." He had also, "a perfect reliance on a future state of existence. 'If I had not hope in this,' he said, 'I should hang myself, for I have lived, and still live, for nothing. I am certain I shall exist hereafter, for I feel that I have had powers given to me by the Deity, which time has not allowed me to exert, or even to develope. I am capable of doing ten times more than I have done done.'

'In further corroboration,' says Mr Knowles, 'of his opinions on this point, I may give the following conversation which I heard. Fuseli was maintaining the immortality of the soul. A gentleman present said, "I could make you or any man of sense disbelieve this, in half an hour's conversation." Fuseli immediately answered, "That I am sure you could not, and I will take care you shan't." '

Upon the whole we have been interested in this life of Mr Fuseli, because we are interested in any man's life, especially if there be anything striking in his character; but we cannot flatter Mr Knowles upon his competence for writing the biography of a man of letters and a painter. Of letters our author knows nothing, and of painting evidently as little; both which circumstances, especially the latter, are not a little curious in a person ambitious of being considered his hero's friend. We should have said less about it, had Mr Knowles been less scrupulous in recording opinions to the disadvantage of others. Of any critical notion which he seems to possess, he does not venture to give us a distinct idea, for the very plain reason that he has none to give. He thinks Sir Thomas Lawrence would have "treated epic subjects" as well as portraits, "if he had employed his pencil exclusively thereon." Speaking of Fuseli's pictures from Shakspeare, he says, "The stately majesty of the ghost of Hamlet's father, contrasted with the expressive energy of his son, and the sublimity brought about by the light, shadow, and general tone, strike the mind with awe. In the picture of Lear, is admirably pourtrayed the stubborn rashness of the father, the filial piety of the discarded daughter, and the wicked determination of Regan and Goneril. The fairy scenes in the Midsummer Night's Dream, amuse the fancy, and shew the vast inventive powers of the painter: and Falstaff with Doll is exquisitely ludicrous." Anybody could write such criticisms as this: and after all, the common-places are not true. When about to sum up the character of Fuseli as an artist, his biographer tells us, that it is not necessary to be very diffuse on that point, as he has been favoured with an "able article, to be found in the appendix, from the pen of William Young Otley, Esq."

Mr Fuseli was a shrewd observer, a lively companion, an excellent scholar, and an honest, if not a very pleasant man. He went to see Mr Johnson in prison, when the Government prosecuted him for a libel; and he would not recommend a man to office for favour's sake. But he was neither the profound thinker, nor the great painter, that Mr Knowles took him for. Those who are acquainted with the best writers, or had been taught to think in an universal spirit for themselves, had nothing to learn from him. There was a line drawn by sentiment and sympathy, beyond which his reflexions never advanced. In his serious pictures, with occasional sketches that promised more than he ever performed, he was the mimic of Michael Angelo; and in his familiar ones, which went upon the ground of what we all knew, and daily saw about us, he took a perverse delight in being as fantastic, as when he was drawing scenes in fairy-land. His familiarities were caricatures of grace, of costume, nay, of affectation itself, making every conscious pretence twenty times more conscious, and exaggerating, with equal absurdity, the turn of a finger, or the toe of a shoe. The secret of his failure, both in historical and domestic painting, was the same; it was the wish to be forcible and original, endeavouring to supply the want of force and originality; and in a mixture of despair of himself and contempt for others, attempting to force it down our throats. Fuseli had not patience to be a good draughtsman; so he must thrust his bones and muscles in our face. He had no eye for colour, and therefore he must paint like putrid brass (if the reader can fancy such a thing) and pronounce the colour "pretty." He could not hit the true point of character, so he must force it; and if we did not recognise the truth of it, we might be "damned." There was an effort in all that he did, a substitution of vehemence for power; and this was accompanied by the personal manners resulting from a consciousness of it. This was the reason why, as a painter, he assumed a right of insulting those who were no painters; and as a man of letters, those who were not literary. When in the presence of his betters, he was glad to be silent, or get out of the way. His faculties all went to the material and gross. In masculine character, he confused outward vigour with inward, physical tension with intensity, the convulsive with the energetic; of which it is but the desperation. And in his ideas of women and beauty, he was merely sensual and meretricious; though occasionally not without the graces which even that side of perception may supply.

In a word, Fuseli was a spoilt German artist; a sort of dream and nightmare of something great, hampered with his senses, and ending in being awake to the common world, without the disposition to please it. He seemed, like many men of little stature, to make up in airs what he wanted in growth, and to be angry that he was not a giant. He was an ostentatious man of talent, and the caricature of a man of genius.

A GOOD EXAMPLE TO INN-KEEPERS.—We put up at the sign of the Three Kings (at Temesvar) in which we found very good accommodation. A very convenient custom is observed there, which is worthy of being adopted in every inn throughout Europe. At the door of every one of the rooms a printed list is fixed, giving the price of the lodgings, and of everything which lodgers may require in the house. This enables every lodger to regulate his expense according to his means, and to pay that which he has incurred, without the risk of being taken advantage of by the landlord.—Journal of a Nobleman.

— The 'Iron Chest' is founded on the story of 'Caleb Williams,' one of the best novels in the language, and the very best of the modern school: but the play itself is by no means the best play that ever was written, either in ancient or modern times, though really in modern times we do not know of any much better. . . . . The great beauty of 'Caleb Williams' is lost in the play. The interest of the novel arises chiefly from two things: the gradual working up of the curiosity of Caleb Williams with respect to the murder, by the incessant goading on of which he extorts the secret from Falkland, and then from the persecution which he undergoes from his master, which at length urges him to reveal the secret to the world.—Both these are very ingeniously left out by Mr Colman, who jumps at a conclusion, but misses his end.—Hazlitt's Dramatic Criticisms.

COVENT GARDEN.

THE new opera (new to the English stage) which was produced here the night before last, called Azor and Zemira, or The Magic Rose, is from the German,—the music by SPOHR, a composer of celebrity now living. The story is the famous one of 'Beauty and the Beast,' the most beautiful of fairy tales. We know not on what authority the Messrs GRIMM ascribe its origin to the East, though nothing is more probable than its coming from that quarter. The honour of it in its popular shape, however, belongs to Madame VILLENEUVE, authoress of the 'Contes Marins,' who took the idea of the sentiment from M. PERRAULT'S story of 'Ricquet with the Tuft,' which comes from Straparola the Neapolitan.* Madame VILLENEUVE deserves great credit for the way in which she has told it. The moral is a divine one, and goes to the deepest and best fountains of the heart. It is that of the triumph of moral grace, of gentleness, and generosity, over external disadvantages; the same as the moral of PARNELL'S story of 'Edwin of the Green,' and of that pretty novel attributed (if we mistake not) to a living descendant of the poet's family, entitled 'Julietta, or the Triumph of Mental Acquirements over Defects.' By the way, why does not somebody republish this novel? It would infallibly repay the speculation, especially at this moment. (Quere,—Is it not written by Sir HENRY PARNELL, who has been just now so properly distinguished?) There is a vein in it of the most generous delicacy, and which becomes more exquisite, according to the delicacy of the circumstances. Could not Mr COLBURN get it for his Standard Novels?

In the opera before us, Beauty, or Zemira (Miss INVERARITY) is the youngest of three daughters of a merchant of the name of Scander (Mr MORLEY), who travelling with his servant Ali (Mr PENSON), loses all his wealth, and finds himself in the palace of Azor, an enchanted prince (Mr WILSON), who for his pride has been subjected to the power of Nigromant a sorcerer (Mr EVANS), and transformed into a brute object of ugliness. Azor's destiny is connected with a Magic Rose, which the merchant seeing in the palace, and taking for a common flower, plucks in order to carry home to his favourite child, the three daughters having requested him on his departure to bring them home presents for each, Fatima (Miss CAWSE), fine clothes, Lesbia (Miss H. CAWSE), jewels, and Zemira, who is the Cordelia of the family, a rose.

The poor merchant has no sooner plucked the rose, than there is a tremendous hubbub, and the princely beast makes his appearance, attended by a set of corresponding monsters (his ex-footmen) who threaten to dash out the criminal's brains with their clubs. The merchant's servant, whose business it is to be facetious in his terrors, undergoes a similar threat; and both prostrate themselves before the dire unknown, whom the servant calls "most magnanimous monster," and "your Awfulness." (Several traits in this piece throughout will remind the spectator of Cinderella.)

His Awfulness, won by the candour and tenderness of the merchant's talk about his family, permits him to retire home to see them, on condition of either coming back himself (Arabian-night fashion) or sending one of his daughters instead. He agrees to the terms, having made up his mind to play the paternal Regulus; but his servant blabbing the secret upon their arrival, Zemira determines upon saving her father's life, and making herself the sacrifice.

The reader must know (or rather must call to mind, from what he knew when a little boy) that the transformed prince is doomed to continue in his ugliness till somebody falls in love with him. In the story as here given, Rosadelle, the Genius of the Rose (Miss LAWRENCE) is "on his side," as the little boys say; and Nigromant the Sorcerer is "against him;" and so Nigromant, first resorting to his hags (who sing like the witches in Macbeth) and then disguising himself like a Mussulman clergyman, presents himself before our heroine, and endeavours to get from her the Magic Rose, which she wears in her bosom. He tells her that it will be her destruction, and that her father means it to be so, in order to save himself. Her good-heartedness (an excellent touch!) gets the better of his cunning, for she will not believe ill of her father. She invokes the Spirit of the Rose, and the impostor sinks cursing under the earth. After this, attended by her father's servant, who is too much moved by her goodness to let her go alone, she is borne in a magic car to the palace of Azor.

The prince's deformity frightens her very much at first. She cannot bear the sight of the shaggy monster, human, or supposed to be human, in nothing but his voice. (For, by the way, Mr WILSON does not dress the character half horribly enough: we are not sure his hairiness would not be a recommendation to him now-a-days, provided he wore bibs.) By degrees, however, the extreme tenderness and generosity of the apparent savage affect his generous visitor: she begins to feel pity for him: she tells him, that if he will but let her go and see her father, she shall even have a pleasure in returning. Moved by her entreaties, despairing almost of making the last desired impression upon her in time to avert his fate (for she must love him by a certain day, or he perishes) but resolved, at all hazards, to deserve her, and shew that he can even die for her, poor Beast lets her go, on condition of her returning by a stated hour. She goes, re-assures her father, returns in the Magic Car (which is ready at a wish) and while loitering and soliloquizing in her host's garden, is visited by the lovely apparition of the Spirit of the Rose, who bids her look at the flower in her bosom. The flower is fading. "So," cries the Spirit, "is thy kind host perishing for love of thee." Zemira feels her heart finally touched as it is wished to be: she flies to save her lover from death; and sees him sitting in a gorgeous hall, enthroned, a powerful and beautiful prince.

We need not say that we love the story of this opera, and that we are among the greatest admirers of all magic cars, fairies, fine gardens, and other desiderata. There were parts of it therefore that interested us, though the story is not so well told as in the children's book. We missed in particular the passage where Beauty comes upon poor Beast, while the latter is about to die; which is omitted in the drama. But we are sorry we cannot speak highly of the music. It is of that class of the German school, which attempts to palm the science of music upon us for the end of the science, and for passion and invention. It is a set of preludes, rather than an opera. There is a sad want of melodies; and the harmonies, though occasionally beautiful, are upon the whole capricious, uncalled for, and inexpressive. There is something sweet in the trio, 'O day of mutual pleasure;' something animated and pleasurable in Zemira's part which follows; the air in honour of the Rose is pretty, with a promise of originality in the outset; and we like the giddy and graceful harp accompaniment to the one sung by Ali, 'Underneath the palm-tree's shade;' but these, after all, are but drops in an ocean of second or third-rate German science. MOZART'S was first-rate, and his genius rode at the top of it, like light over the harmonized elements. His stalk always has a flower. His ocean of sweet sounds is swept by divine shapes. There are spirits and human faces over it. These harmonies of the school that pretends to succeed him, are, we allow, a chaos in tune, but they are little else. The waves break pleasantly against one another, but there is no object. There is nothing but the sounds.

There is some beautiful scenery in this piece, and we like the flying cars, and the flying spirits, because they do fly; not because the cars are as pretty as the cupids; for Mr FARLEY has made them somewhat clumsy. Why is every mystical machine to have whirling circles to it, or wheels? The figure is mystic, but the effect is not good. It looks vulgar; and four whirring circular fans, at the four corners of a mass of gilding, do it no good in the air. They seem of no use, and could be of none.

All the performers do well, not forgetting Mr MORLEY, who has something sterling and unpretending about him; nor excepting Mr PENSON, whose humour is more palpable than fine. Mr WILSON is greatly improved in his acting. Our little friend, HARRIET CAWSE, always sings sweetly, and does good service in the trios. Her sister (as all the papers are agreed) is finer in her dress than her perceptions, but she scolds well, and has vocal skill besides. But what say we to our new charmer, Miss INVERARITY? Why, that she has been growing more charming every day for the last ten weeks; that she is daily acquiring confidence to develope her charmingness; and that she will infallibly equal the best singers we have in science, and beat them all to pieces in sensibility. She has gusto and the right Italian enjoyment. She makes the audience happy by seeming to be so herself; smiles at them, and with them, as if she knew them to be her friends; that is to say, sings with the proper bocca ridente, and seems to taste the words in her mouth, as if they were "tarts and cheese-cakes," as Sancho says. She uttered the mere word sweet in such a manner, in the trio above-mentioned, that the audience were in love with her. Finally, she was dressed in a manner that extremely became her; and altogether looked a very handsome, happy, and happy-making person. What a pleasure it is to see anybody succeed in this way! ☛

FRIDAY, APRIL 8, 1831.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

The Life of Napoleon Bonaparte. By M. de Bourrienne, his Private Secretary. With Notes, now first added, from the Dictation of Napoleon at St Helena, from the Memoirs of the Duke of Rovigo, of General Rapp, of Constant, and numerous other Authentic Sources. In 3 vols. fcap. 8vo. (Being the 7th, 8th, and 9th vols. of the National Library). Colburn and Bentley.

Bourrienne's are the completest personal recollections of Bonaparte that have appeared; and the publishers, besides putting the book forth in its cheapest and pleasantest form, have increased its interest, as the title-page will shew, by a variety of corroborations or counter-opinions from other writers. In short, this present edition of Bourrienne, besides being the only complete one in itself, is accompanied, by way of notes, with the most interesting passages from writers who enjoyed similar opportunities of knowing the extraordinary person whose history he relates: so that it may be called a variorum edition of the personal history of Napoleon. Sir Walter Scott's is a party history, ill-written and careless, and painfully exhibiting the author in the light of a deserter of his own cause, that of genius, for the sake of supporting the sorry worship of legitimacy, in which he was brought up. Mr Hazlitt's is a party history of a reverse kind, and beating it all to pieces in point of writing and reflexion, but too favourable to Napoleon, out of spleen against his inferiors. As for M. de Bourrienne, we confess we have no trust in him, except where the probable nature of the circumstances bears him out. The stamp of truth is, we grant, so apparent, over the greater portion of his work, especially up to a certain period, that we had implicit faith in it, till we came to the part where he would fain have us believe, that no man was a greater lover of truth than himself, at the very moment when he was the organ of Bonaparte's lying bulletins, in quality of his Secretary. After this we did not believe a word he said, unless warranted by events or by his hero's character: yet such, nevertheless, is the evident truth to be gathered from what he relates, partly owing to there being no reason, generally speaking, why he should write otherwise, and partly to his mixed liking and dislike for Napoleon, which produced an involuntary balance of judgment in him, to be found in no other writer,—that if we wished to judge for ourselves of any part of Bonaparte's life or manners, we would rather go to Bourrienne, as a text to reflect upon, than any other of his biographers.

This new edition, thus rendered complete, has a good frontispiece portrait to each of the volumes (Napoleon, Josephine, and Maria Louisa), and engravings in wood of some of the most celebrated pictures of Bonaparte's career, which the publishers ought not to have condescended to call "prints of great graphic beauty." They are very well for engravings of such pictures in wood, and we observe a good artist's name in the list of the workmen; but they have been evidently done at that cheap rate, which is notoriously understood to be incompatible with excellence.

So much has been written, re-written, and re-extracted about Napoleon, that, although we consider these volumes as an addition to our shelves, we are at a loss what particular specimen to give, for fear the reader should have lately met with it. We cannot well err, however, in taking it from the chapter containing an account of Bonaparte's personal habits and appearance. Such accounts, almost of anybody, are interesting, much more of an individual like this, who, though not exactly the great man which either his partizans or his enemies (after they had exalted their own opinion of themselves by overthrowing him) were willing to take him for, was still a very extraordinary man, as well as a great soldier, and only failed, because he took all the rest of the world to be no better people than the Allied Monarchs:—

'The person of Bonaparte has served as a model for the most skilful painters and sculptors; many able French artists have successfully delineated his features, and yet it may be said that no perfectly faithful portrait of him exists. His finely shaped head, his superb forehead, his pale countenance, and his usual meditative look, have been transferred to the canvass; but the versatility of his expression was beyond the reach of imitation. All the workings of his mind were instantaneously depicted in his countenance; and his glance changed from mild to severe, and from angry to good-humoured, almost with the rapidity of lightning. It may truly be said that he had a particular look for every thought that arose in his mind.

'Bonaparte had beautiful hands, and he was very proud of them; while conversing he would often look at them with an air of self-complacency. He also fancied he had fine teeth, but his pretension to that advantage was not so well founded as his vanity on the score of his hands.

'When walking, either alone or in company with any one, in his apartments, or in his gardens, he had the habit of stooping a little and crossing his hands behind his back. He frequently gave an involuntary shrug of his right shoulder, which was accompanied by a movement of his mouth from left to right. This habit was always most remarkable when his mind was absorbed in the consideration of any profound subject. It was often while walking that he dictated to me his most important notes. He could endure great fatigue, not only on horseback, but on foot; he would sometimes walk for five or six hours in succession, without being aware of it.

'When walking with any person whom he treated with familiarity, he would link his arm into that of his companion, and lean on it.

'He used often to say to me, "You see, Bourrienne, how temperate and how thin I am; but, in spite of that, I cannot help thinking that at forty I shall become a great eater, and get very fat. I foresee that my constitution will undergo a change. I take a great deal of exercise, but yet I feel assured that my presentiment will be fulfilled." This idea gave him great uneasiness, and as I observed nothing which seemed to warrant his apprehensions, I omitted no opportunity of assuring him that they were groundless. But he would not listen to me, and all the time that I was about him he was haunted with this presentiment, which, in the end, was but too well verified.

'His partiality for the bath he mistook for a necessity. He would usually remain in the bath two hours, during which time I used to read to him extracts from the journals and pamphlets of the day, for he was anxious to hear and know all that was going on. While in the bath, he was continually turning on the warm water, to raise the temperature, so that I was sometimes enveloped in such a dense vapour that I could not see to read, and was obliged to open the door.*

'Bonaparte was exceedingly temperate, and averse to all excess. He knew the absurd stories that were circulated about him, and he was sometimes vexed at them. It has been repeated over and over again, that he was subject to attacks of epilepsy; but during the eleven years that I was almost constantly with him, I never observed any symptom which in the least degree denoted that malady. His health was good, and his constitution sound. If his enemies, by way of reproach, have attributed to him a serious periodical disease, his flatterers, probably under the idea that sleep is incompatible with greatness, have evinced an equal disregard of truth, in speaking of his night-watching. Bonaparte made others watch; but he himself slept, and slept well. His orders were, that I should call him every morning at seven. I was, therefore, the first to enter his chamber; but very frequently, when I awoke him, he would turn himself, and say, "Ah, Bourrienne, let me lie a little longer." When there was no very pressing business, I did not disturb him again till eight o'clock. He in general slept seven hours out of the twenty-four, besides taking a short nap in the afternoon.

'Among the private instructions which Bonaparte gave me, one was very curious:—"During the night," said he, "enter my chamber as seldom as possible. Do not awake me when you have any good news to communicate; with that there is no hurry. But when you bring bad news, rouse me instantly; for then there is not a moment to be lost."

'This was a wise regulation, and Bonaparte found his advantage in it.

'As soon as he arose, his valet-de-chambre shaved him and dressed his hair. While he was being shaved, I read to him the

* 'At St Helena, he is said to have continued in the bath three hours at a time. Is it not possible that his immoderate use of baths of very high temperature may have contributed to produce the premature corpulency which he so greatly dreaded? I recollect having several times hinted such a possibility to him.'

newspapers, beginning always with the Moniteur. He paid little attention to the German and English papers. "Pass over all that," he would say, while I was perusing the French papers; "I know it already. They say only what they think will please me." I was often surprised that his valet did not cut him while I was reading; for, whenever he heard anything interesting, he turned quickly round towards me.*

'When Bonaparte finished his toilet, which he did with great attention, for he was scrupulously neat in his person, he went down stairs to his cabinet. There he signed the orders on important petitions which had been analyzed by me on the preceding evening. On reception and parade days, he was particularly exact in signing these orders, because I used to remind him that he would be likely to see most of the petitioners, and that they would ask him for answers. To spare him this annoyance, I used often to acquaint them beforehand of what had been granted or refused. He next perused the letters which I had opened and laid on his table, ranging them according to their importance. He directed me to answer them in his name; he occasionally wrote the answers, but not often.

'At ten o'clock the maitre d'hotel entered, and announced breakfast, saying, "The general's table is served."† We went to breakfast, and the repast was exceedingly simple. He eat, almost every morning, some chicken, dressed with oil and onions. This dish was then, I believe, called poulet à la Provençale; but our restaurateurs have since conferred upon it the more ambitious name of poulet à la Marengo.

'Bonaparte drank little wine, always either claret or Burgundy, and the latter in preference to the former. After breakfast, as well as after dinner, he took a cup of strong coffee.‡

'I never saw him take any between his meals, and I cannot imagine what could have given rise to the assertion of his being particularly fond of coffee. When he sat up late at night, he never ordered coffee, but chocolate, of which he made me take a cup with him. But this only happened when our business was prolonged till two or three in the morning.

'All that has been said about Bonaparte's immoderate use of snuff, has no more foundation in truth than his pretended partiality for coffee. It is true, that at an early period of his life, he began to take snuff, but it was very sparingly, and always out of a box; and if he bore any resemblance to Frederic the Great, it was not by filling his waistcoat pockets with snuff; for, I must again observe, he carried his notions of personal neatnesss to a fastidious degree.'§—Vol. 1, p. 308.

'One of Bonaparte's greatest misfortunes was, that he neither believed in friendship nor felt the necessity of loving. How often have I heard him say, "Friendship is but a name; I love nobody. Perhaps Joseph a little, from habit, and because he is my elder; and Duroc, I love him, too. But why? Because his character pleases me. He is stern and resolute, and I really believe the fellow never shed a tear. For my part, I know very well that I have no true friends. As long as I continue what I am, I may have as many pretended friends as I please. Leave sensibility to women, it is their business. But men should be firm in heart and in purpose, or they should have nothing to do with war or government."

'In his social relations, Bonaparte's temper was bad; but his fits of ill-humour passed away like a cloud, and spent themselves in words.

'When in good humour, his usual tokens of kindness consisted in a little rap on the head, or a slight pinch on the ear. In his most friendly conversations with those whom he admitted into his intimacy, he would say, "You are a fool"—"a simpleton"—"a ninny"—"a blockhead." These, and a few other words of like import, enabled him to vary his catalogue of compliments; but he never employed them angrily, and the tone in which they were uttered, sufficiently indicated that they were meant in kindness.

'Bonaparte had many singular habits and tastes. Whenever he experienced any vexation, or when any unpleasant thought occupied his mind, he would hum something which was far from resembling a tune, for his voice was very unmusical. He would at the same time, seat himself before the writing table, and swing back in his chair so far, that I have often been fearful of his falling.

'He would then vent his ill-humour, on the right arm of his chair, mutilating it with his penknife. I always took care to keep good pens ready for him; for, as it was my business to decipher his writing, I had a strong interest in doing what I could to make it legible.

'The ringing of bells always produced in Bonaparte pleasurable sensations. When we were at Malmaison, and walking in the alley, leading to the plain of Ruel, how many times has the bell of the village church interrupted our most serious conversations. He would stop, lest our footsteps should drown any portion of the sound. He was almost angry with me because I did not experience the impressions he did. So powerful was the effect produced on him by the sound of these bells, that his voice would falter as he said, "Ah, that reminds me of the first years I spent at Brienne. I was then happy!" When the bells ceased, he would resume the course of his speculations, carry himself into futurity, place a crown on his head, and dethrone kings. * * * *

'Bonaparte had no faith in medicine, or medical remedies. He spoke of medicine as an art entirely conjectural, and his opinion on this subject was fixed and incontrovertible. His vigorous mind rejected all but demonstrated proofs. * * * *

'Bonaparte was insensible to the charms of poetic harmony. He had not even sufficient ear to feel the rhythm of poetry; and he never could recite a verse without violating the metre; yet the grand ideas of poetry charmed him. He absolutely worshipped Corneille; and, one day, after witnessing a performance of Cinna, he said to me, "If a man like Corneille were living in my time, I would make him my prime minister. It is not his poetry that I most admire, it is his powerful understanding; his vast knowledge of the human heart, and his profound policy. At St Helena, he said that he would have made Corneille a prince; but at the time he spoke to me of Corneille he had no thought of making either princes or kings.

'Gallantry to women was by no means a trait in Bonaparte's character. He seldom said anything agreeable to females, and he frequently addressed to them the rudest and most extraordinary remarks. To one he would say, "Heavens, how red your elbows are!"—to another, "What an ugly head-dress you've got!"—At another time he would say, "Your dress is none of the cleanest. . . . Do you never change your gown? I have seen you in that twenty times."* He shewed no mercy to any one who displeased him on these points. He often gave Josephine directions about her toilet, and the exquisite taste for which she was distinguished might have helped to make him fastidious about the costume of other ladies. At first, he looked to elegance above all things: at a late period, he admired luxury and splendour; but he always required modesty. He frequently expressed his disapproval of the low-necked dresses which were so much in fashion at the beginning of the Consulate.

'Bonaparte did not love cards, and this was very fortunate for those who were invited to his parties; for when he was seated at a card-table, as he sometimes thought himself obliged to be, nothing could exceed the dulness of the drawing-room, either at the Luxembourg or the Tuileries. When, on the contrary, he walked about among the company, all were pleased, for he usually spoke to everybody, though he preferred the conversation of men of science, especially those who had been with him in Egypt; as for example, Monge and Berthollet. He also liked to talk with Chaptal and Lacépède, and with Lemercier, the author of 'Agamemnon.'

'Bonaparte was seen to less advantage in a drawing-room than at the head of his troops. His military uniform became him much better than the handsomest dress of any other kind. His first trials of dress-coats were unfortunate. I have been informed that the first time he wore one he kept on his black cravat. This incongruity was remarked to him, and he replied, "So much the better: it leaves me something of a military air, and there is no harm in that." For my own part, I neither saw the black cravat, nor heard this reply.

'On the subject of Bonaparte's dress, Constant gives the following details: "His Majesty's waistcoats and small-clothes were always of white cassimir. He changed them every morning, and never wore them after they had been washed three or four times. He never wore any but white silk stockings. His shoes, which were very light and lined with silk, were ornamented with gold buckles of an oval form, either plain or wrought. He also occasionally wore gold knee-buckles. During the empire, I never saw

* 'It was Constant's task to shave Bonaparte, and he thus speaks of the difficulties he experienced in the discharge of his duty:—

'"While I was shaving him he would often converse, read the journals, move restlessly in his chair, or turn suddenly round, so that I was obliged to preserve the utmost caution, in order to avoid cutting him. Luckily that misfortune never occurred to me. When by chance he was not engaged in conversation or reading, he would sit as motionless as a statue, and I could not get him to raise, lower, or incline his head, to facilitate my operation. He had a singular whim of having only side of his face soaped and shaved at once, and he would not allow me to proceed to the other side until the first was finished."

'Constant adds, "that Bonaparte could not shave himself until he instructed him in the mode of holding and applying the razor: but that, owing to his natural impatience and hastiness of manner, he never attempted the operation without severely cutting himself."'

† This, of course, refers to the time when we were at the Luxembourg.

‡ M. Brillat de Savarin, whose memory is dear to all gourmands, had established as a gastronomic principle, that "he who does not take coffee after each meal, is assuredly not a man of taste."

§ It has been alleged that his Majesty took an inordinate deal of snuff, and that in order to take it with the greater facility, he carried it in his waistcoat pockets, which for that purpose were lined with leather. This is altogether untrue. The fact is, the Emperor never took snuff except from a snuff-box, and though he used a great deal, he actually took but very little. Thus it frequently happened that the spot where he was sitting or standing was strewed with snuff; but his handkerchiefs, which were of the finest cambric, were scarcely ever soiled. He had a great collection of snuff-boxes; but those which he preferred were of dark tortoise-shell, lined with gold, and ornamented with cameos or antique medals in gold or silver. Their form was a narrow oval, with hinged lids. He did not like round boxes, because it was necessary to employ both hands to open them, and in this operation he not unfrequently let the box or lid fall. His snuff was generally very coarse rappee; but he sometimes liked to have several kinds of snuff mixed together.—Memoires de Constant, vol. 2, p. 87.—[E. Ed.]

* Bonaparte, after he became Emperor, said one day to the beautiful Duchess de Chevereuse, in the presence of all the circle at the Tuileries, "Ah, that's droll enough; your hair is red." "Perhaps it is, Sire," replied the lady, "but this is the first time a man ever told me so." Madame de Chevereuse, whose hair was, on the contrary, a beautiful blond, was shortly after exiled to Tours, for having declined the office of Maid of Honour to the Queen of Spain.

him wear pantaloons. The emperor never wore jewels. In his pockets he carried neither purse nor money, but merely his handkerchief, snuff-box, and bonbanière (or sweet-meat box). He usually wore only two decorations, viz. the cross of the Legion of Honour and that of the Iron Crown. Across his waistcoat and under his uniform coat, he wore a cordon rouge, the two ends of which were scarcely perceptible. When he received company at the Tuileries, or attended a review, he wore the grand cordon on the outside of his coat. His hat, which it is almost superfluous to describe, as long as portraits of his Majesty are extant, was of an extremely fine and light kind of beaver: the inside was wadded and lined with silk. It was unadorned with either cord, tassel, or feather; its only ornament being a silk loop fastening a small tri-coloured cockade.'—Vol. II, p. 317—320.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

SHELLEY AND KEATS, AND THEIR "REVIEWER."

Two heavenly doves I saw, which were indeed
Sweet birds and gentle—like the immortal pair
That waft the Cyprian chariot thro' the air;
And with their songs made music, to exceed
All thought of what rich poesy might be:
At which, a crow, perch'd on a sullen tree,
Dingy and hoarse, made baser by their brightness,
Would fain be judge of melody and whiteness,
And caw'd dire sentence on those sweet-throat turtles;
To which his fellow flock of carrion things
Croak'd clamorous assent: but still the wings
Of those pure birds are white amid the myrtles
Of every grove, where cull they nectar's seed,
Whilst still on cold, dead flesh, those carrion creatures feed.

DRURY-LANE.

THE new farce, which was brought out here last uight, under the title of Nettlewig Hall, or Ten to One, from the pen of Mr MOLLOY WESTMACOTT, is the old story of a guardian, a ward, a lover, a footman, and a lady's maid. Item, a key. Item, a billet-doux. FARREN is the guardian, Mrs WAYLETT the ward, VINING the lover, HARLEY the footman, and Mrs ORGER the lady's maid; and the reader who is acquainted with these performers is acquainted with the leading incidents, and the pleasant manner in which they must be given, whatever the author may or may not have done for them. In the first act there were a few plays upon words, not unamusing; but the rest, especially the second act, was a poor business. The reader is to imagine the old story going on as usual, with the exception of an ejectment of servants from the old gentleman's house. These the lover converts into a corps of "sappers and miners;" but all that he does with them, to the best of our knowledge, is to try and frighten the guardian with dressing one or two of them up as ghosts, and so the guardian is not frightened; which, it must be confessed, is a new kind of dramatic surprise, and mightily helps forward the plot! The main device is the getting his footman into the house as a female cook, in order that he may let the women out at night. The goodnatured Easter audience, who were in the holiday humour of being pleased with anything, and who had the new farce judiciously served up to them like a sandwich between the Brigand and the Ice Witch, were contented enough up to the point where the footman commences his nocturnal operations: but a sudden hubbub in the dead of night, and a ghastly cry raised by the old housekeeper, that there was "a dead body" in her bed, produced an impression with many, unfavourable to the author's good taste, perhaps to his common feeling; for a dead body so introduced to their imaginations was felt to be a different thing from the usual comic treatments of mortality: nor was the impression altered to advantage, when a great doll was brought out by the guardian, and flung about on the stage. The opposition to the piece began at this point, and continued to struggle with the approbation more or less throughout the remainder of it. The meaning of this dead body was, that the supposed female cook was to share the bed of the housekeeper, and a doll had been substituted instead. When the confusion attendant upon this adventure has subsided, and the parties are all gone to bed but the old gentleman, two ghosts come in, made up with sheets and poles, and with a lanthorn of a death's head at top of them; and the old gentleman, as before observed, is not frightened. He sees the boots of his supernatural friends, tips over their poles and death's-heads, and sends them about their business. This was inefficient work, and the hisses were renewed. Presently, the lover's valet returns (in the dead of the night, observe; for no advance of the hour is implied), and dabbing his eyes with a pathetic handkerchief, tells the old gentleman that his nephew has killed himself in consequence of his hard-heartedness; and here, quoth he, introducing a melancholy gentleman, is the undertaker, come for orders! The guardian takes all this as the most natural thing in world, and goes to consult with the undertaker in his private room; upon which the sly rogue of a valet locks him in, and fetching the young lady out of another room, carries her off to his master, who, before a less stirring lover could have well turned the corner of the street, brings her back again, married! This is a burlesque in the style of the French opera that was translated some time ago in the TATLER, consisting of three acts of about six lines a-piece:—a practical comment upon the famous modest request of the poet,—

Ye gods, annihilate but space and time,
And make two lovers happy.

HARLEY could not get a hearing for some time, when he came to give out the piece for repetition. At length he was enabled to speak. Ladies and gentlemen, tomorrow evening will be presented, for the first time, a new tragic drama, called the Pledge, or Castilian Honour; and on Saturday evening, ladies and gentlemen, with your kind permission,—

No! No! No!
Yes! Yes!
No! No!

The contents were the majority; but the piece will not have a run. It is too lame, we should think, for a walk. ☛

A new historical drama on the subject of that greatest of Sovereigns, Alfred (after whom it is named), will appear on the 16th inst. at Drury-Lane, from the pen of the author of Virginius.

VARIOUS ACCOUNTS OF ABRAHAM.—Some curious accounts of Abraham are related by Arabian and Jewish writers; among others, it has been said that Terah, the father of Abraham, made statues and images for the purposes of that idolatrous worship which had been transmitted to him from his ancestor Serug, and which he encouraged by example and exhortation. Some Jewish authors relate that Abraham pursued the same occupation; and Maimonides says that he was educated in the religion of the Sabæans, who acknowledged no deity but the stars; and that he was led by his own reflections to the belief of an intelligent Creator and Governor of the universe; but that he did not renounce paganism till the fiftieth year of his age. Suidas informs us, that at sixteen years of age he cautioned his father against seducing men to idolatry for the sake of pernicious gain, and taught him that there is no other God besides him who dwells in heaven, and created the whole world. It is added that he destroyed the statues and images of his father, and departed with him from Chaldea. Others relate that his father deputed Abraham to sell his statues in his absence, and that a man who pretended to be a purchaser, having ascertained that he was fifty years of age, remonstrated with him for adoring, at such an age, a being which was but a day old. Abraham, impressed and confounded by this remonstrance, destroyed them all, excepting the largest, before his father's return; and he told him that, having presented an oblation of flour to the idols, the stoutest of them, in whose hands he had placed a hatchet, hewed the others to pieces with that weapon. Terah replied that this was bantering, because the idols had not sense to act in this manner: upon which Abraham retorted these words upon his father against the worship of such gods. But he was delivered up by Terah to Nimrod, the sovereign of the country; and because he refused to worship the fire, according to his order, he was thrown into the midst of the flames, from which he escaped uninjured.—Mignan's Travels in Chaldæa.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

A Play-Wright's Adventures. By Frederic Reynolds. (Being the Dramatic Annual for 1831.) 18mo. pp. 356. Longman.

We shall certainly be seduced into taking regular notice of novels, for they come upon us in new shapes; they engage our attention upon unexpected grounds. One makes its appearance as a set of stories from history; another, as part of a new series of old favourites; and a third, as a Dramatic Annual. (By the way, we have finished our reading of 'Caleb Williams,' and have found it interesting in the highest degree; admirably well written, profound in many of its reflections, and yet, withal, as out of nature as a dream. Falkland's character is preposterously over-rated by his biographer, and poor Caleb made to depreciate himself as superfluously: but the interest is absorbing, and if Falkland is not in nature, he furnishes but the more extraordinary triumph to the author, for, in spite of a defect fatal to all other inventions, Mr Godwin has clearly made him immortal. He has added him to the number of existing beings.*)

The Dramatic Annual is resolved, it seems, to be criticised, whether editors choose to criticise it or not. For this purpose, it puts on its best dress, and comes upon us with a mixture of confidence, modesty, and good humour, which, we confess, we have found irresistible. The binding, or boarding, or half-binding, or whatever else it is called, is one of the prettiest we have seen,—a cream colour, cornered and backed with green, and gilt and lettered at the top of the back (by far the best way), in an elegant style of florid neatness. The wood-cuts, by Mr Brooke, are not so good as they might be, but they are numerous; and a lover of "picture-books" would rather have them than not. And then, or rather first of all, there is the following insidious dedication:—

'To
Those Powerful Personages,
Who Can at Once Mark or Mar an Author's Hopes
The Conductors of the Press,
I Dedicate
The Dramatic Annual,
Simply Hoping
That This Little Work May Not Be Deemed Wholly Unworthy of their Notice.
Should They Allow
That it possesses Some Redeeming Qualities, Probably They Will
Criticise It Indulgently.
But At Any Rate I Entreat Them To Criticise It,
And
Not Suffer It To Die in Obscurity.
Fred. Reynolds.'

Mr Reynolds is an old acquaintance of ours, though we have not the pleasure of knowing him, and never saw his face. It was he that for so long a period wrote so many successful plays, fugitive indeed, for they were the reflexions of fugitive manners; but pleasant and good-humoured, and better than any comic dramas produced now, of equal size; albeit there was a certain boy-critic of that day, who, in the ignorance of his school-knowledge, undertook to decry them. Mr Reynolds is the author of the Dramatist, which the grand-children of its first audiences are in no hurry to part with; and his plays are agreeably identified in our recollections with that delightful comedian Lewis, for whom he wrote many of his characters, and who was of a congenial temperament with the lively and good-humoured author. It is a singular pleasure to see our veteran dramatist writing, at his time of life, with all the vivacity of a youth; for such is the case of the novel before us. The groundwork of it is not very new; the incidents are not all very probable; the substance is not very solid; yet there is a charm of animal spirits and good-nature prevailing over it, analogous to those of youth itself, or of one of those rare, indulged children, who deserve to be indulged, because they turn everything to the kindly by dint of their own good-will. The only severe remarks we have met with in the course of a hundred and sixty pages, are to be found in the following extract; which extract we make, not because of the severity (for that would be an injustice to the predominant character of the book) but because it suits a journal which criticises the drama, and lets the reader into some secrets which import him as a play-goer. For the rest, the story of the novel is that of a young dramatist, who goes through a variety of unconnected adventures, and is secretly beloved by a young lady of quality. Her father, an old admiral, has married her to a somewhat elderly brother officer, which officer is not only conveniently ordered upon foreign service the very day of his wedding, but, with an exquisite consideration on the part of Destiny, dies before he comes home. This is what Sir Hugh Evans would call "pretty virginities!" The author, however, with the usual good sense of his good-nature (for there is more in that than people imagine) has not made the husband a disagreeable fellow, nor unregarded by his wife; and this throws an interest over the circumstances, not of a common order. The style of the writing might be called flippant, if it were not evidently the genuine result of the author's temperament. It abounds in ordinary and stage-struck quotations; and the dialogue gives you the idea of its passing upon the stage. There is a superabundance in it of the gesticulative and emphatic. Many of the points, both of dialogue and incident, would so obviously tell in a theatre, that they have made us wish the author would write another comedy. He must be now, we should think, almost the father of the drama; and yet, to judge from the tone of the volume before us, we should say he was the youngest fellow connected with the stage. Vivat chatowayatque in æternum.

Could not Mr Reynolds, in his next Dramatic Annual, give us some more anecdotes of Lewis and others, in addition to what he has told us in his Life,—together with more chat on theatres and managers, and portraits (both written and engraved); taking care that the likenesses from the pencil be as genuine as those from the pen? Stories of Edwin, Bannister, &c. would be acceptable, and of the female performers; and the wood-cuts might be of a very miscellaneous nature. We should like to have a portrait even of Garrick's snuff-box, or of Peg Woffington's slipper.

But to our extract.—Harry Vivid, the hero of the story, is supping with a stranger at an inn:—

'After supper, the social glass was being put merrily about, when Alltact hastily entered, and, with a countenance replete with joy and astonishment, requested to speak one word with his master. Our hero, after some little hesitation, and much beckoning on the part of Sam, consented; and they had scarcely got outside the door, when the agitated valet whispered pretty loudly in his master's ear—

'"'Tis the manager."

'"Who? what manager?" replied Vivid.

'"Why, the stranger with whom you have been conversing and supping is no less a personage than the director of one of the metropolitan winter theatres, and the very gentleman who refused your comedy, and recommended——"

'"Heavens! Mr Candide!"

'"The same. Over a bottle of porter in the tap-room I have this moment pumped the secret out of his servant."

'Vivid lost not a moment in re-entering the parlour, but so changed, so respectful; the familiarity which he lately indulged in had completely vanished; and every question and answer being prefaced and terminated with that formal monosyllable, "Sir," Mr Candide (for Alltact was correct in his intelligence) could not refrain from expressing his surprise at this sudden alteration in his new acquaintance's manner and character.

'The mystery was instantly solved, by Vivid putting into his hands the kind, memorable, and important letter.

* There are passages in this novel, which bear with singular force upon the question now at issue between the Reformers and Boroughmongers. The brutal, overbearing Tyrrell is a Boroughmonger, in the full flower of his insolence and moral absurdity.

'The manager smiled, and endeavoured to restore his companion to his former feelings of equality, but in vain. No lover ever felt more awkward, or rather awe-stricken, in the presence of his mistress, than our enthusiastic young dramatist felt at this moment; for he saw before him, or rather fancied that he saw, the man who was doomed to preside over his future fate.

'"Come," said Mr Candide, "sit down, Sir, and I will soon convince you that I am not exactly so great and powerful a personage as you suppose me to be. First, give me your hand; next, a bumper to our better acquaintance. There, and now allow me to ask—Would you treat an actor with similar respect?"

'"Certainly not, Sir. I look upon him as one, who, in most respects, is dependent on the manager."

'"You mistake. The manager is, now-a-days, dependent on him, at least on every first-rate performer; but, by way of preamble, please to understand that the remarks I am about to make are only applicable to those actors and actresses who demand and receive large nightly salaries; for as to the second, third, and fourth-rate performers, i. e. the stock company—why, looking at each of them as my fellow-labourer in an unproductive vineyard, I am consequently their advocate and champion."

'"I comprehend you: you only mean to complain of what Churchill calls the 'monarch players.'"

'"Certainly not. But the truth is, since the star system commenced, and the salaries have been nearly more than trebled, these 'monarch players' have become so much above their employer, that when on a Saturday (pay-day) I drive to the theatre in a hackney-coach, I am often prevented getting up to the stage-door, in consequence of the number of their gay chariots, cabriolets, and other handsome equipages."

'"Indeed! and authors?" earnestly enquired Vivid, but in his usual unsophisticated style. "How many authors' carriages drive up?"

'"Oh, as to authors," replied the smiling manager, "two or three of them, perhaps, mount old umbrellas; but when some people are overpaid, other people must be necessarily under paid, you know, and——"

'"How? why, I thought, at least I have heard of a thousand pounds being made by a comedy."

'"True; but in that day there were no stars; or if there were, they had gazers, and at any rate did not rise in demand as they fell in attraction. Colman received for John Bull eleven hundred pounds, and he well deserved such remuneration; for the comedy averaged four hundred and seventy-eight pounds for forty-eight nights, and the salary of no actor who performed in it (and amongst such actors were George Cooke, Lewis, Fawcett, Emery, John Johnstone, &c.) exceeded twenty pounds a-week;* whereas 'there be players,' who latterly actually have received double that sum per night! and this at a time when a first-rate actor (not singer) at Paris, is content with getting about four hundred pounds per annum."†

'"Well, but excuse me, my good Sir, if the system does not answer, why go on giving such high and ruinous salaries?"

'"Why, 'there's the rub,' and I can only thus explain the case.—You have heard, I presume, of two rival stage-coach proprietors, who, in the frenzy of competition, blind with rage and jealousy, became so determined to outvie each other in the number of customers, that at last each not only ran his coach from Exeter to London gratis, but actually paid for every passenger's provisions during the journey. Such is nearly mine and my rival manager's stage contest; and till we can get an understanding (not so easy a theatrical acquirement, I assure you), and imitate the examples of our predecessors, those firm allies, Messrs Sheridan and Harris,‡ why, season after season, we shall only open the doors of our magnitudinous concerns to find provisions for others, certainly not for ourselves."

'"So it appears; and yet I believe, Sir, you will frankly acknowledge, that you sometimes reap a productive harvest."

'"We do, once in three or four years; and entre nous, I'll tell you how such harvest is produced; but mind, your finger on your lips."

'Vivid bowed assent, and Mr Candide continued.

'"Why, aware, Sir, that of late years more has been achieved off than on the stage, we invent, or rather manufacture, an histrionic lion or lioness."§

'"What! I don't understand."

'"Observe! In the event of two or three disastrous seasons, that formidable champion, the press, always most liberally and good-naturedly comes forward, and offers to rally round the falling house. After various preparatory sprites, we then bring out our manufactured novelty—our aforesaid lion or lioness—of course taking care that the curtain shall draw up to a crowded audience; for if it be a bad house, the town regularly deem it to be a bad performance. Then, as to applause, in addition to our own rank and file, the dread of closing our doors induces so many hundreds to open their hands and mouths, that those rounds and continued bravos are secured to every attitude and clap-trap; next, if a tragedy be selected for this important first appearance, we rely on the never failing pathetic author's producing tears; but having three or four fainters at command, we ourselves bring them into action."

'"Capital! Why, you leave nothing to chance?"

'"Nothing; for, the curtain down, the hackneyed call, amidst waving of hats and handkerchiefs, is huzzaingly made and acceded to. Laurel is likewise thrown on the stage; and next morning the tocsin of panegyric, being sounded in every liberal paper, in a day or two after, the manager not only raises the salary, but publicly, in the green-room, makes a brilliant and appropriate present; next, most of the print-shops display a likeness of the new wonder, whose defects actually become beauties; then, in case of the slightest indisposition, bulletins are issued, and the box-keeper is also ordered to state, that not a box is to be had for a month. Such a sufficient quantity of dust is thrown into John Bull's eyes,* that he cannot see any mode of escape, and therefore, though at last he finds it out, he COMES till he does find it out, and which act of kindness is all that is required in a city whose population consists of above a million and a half of capable customers. There, don't you call this management?"†

'"I do, I do! and although to me these dramatic tactics are all new, I must certainly confess, on arriving in town, I have, like others, more than once felt that I could not shew my face till I had seen Mr or Master, or Miss, whatever might be the name of the 'new wonder.' And although I then saw, or fancied I saw, 'the hand of the conjuror,' yet I was more than half afraid to say so."

'"To be sure: and after our friend John Bull, who is, individually, often a shrewd, good fellow, but, collectively, generally very fat-headed, having taken one boy for the genuine Shakspeare, and another boy for a superior Garrick,‡ why can the town call us traitors? No—or if they do, may we not answer—

'Hic murus aheneus esto,
Nil conscire sibi nulla pallescere culpa?'"

'"Yes; and, conscientiously speaking, where is the moral turpitude in raising a young performer and surrounding family probably from poverty to independence?§ and, by a successful season, of procuring the means of satisfying our own fair and honourable creditors!"

'The clock at this moment striking "twelve," Mr Candide rose, and hoped, if his companion thought his observations had been over severe, he would remember Churchill's well-known couplet:—

"The stage I choose, a subject fair and free;
'Tis mine, 'tis yours, 'tis public property."

Vivid agreed with him that it was every way a fair subject for criticism, and they parted for the night."—P. 42.

* 'I speak chiefly of the indiscriminating John Bulls, not of those who think and judge for themselves, of which, thank fortune! there are still a considerable number.

† 'It is as singular as true, that when these male or female bolstered-up novices become (in two or three years) by practice and experience, bonâ fide good second-rate performers, then my lord, my lady, and the other indiscriminating Johns, never attend their performances. Then also, defects are no longer considered as beauties; and what the aforesaid Johns (during their rage) called a musical voice, is now proved to be a whining one, and a Grecian nose, a pug one!

‡ Young Ireland and Master Betty.

§ Taking the country engagements into account, even to affluence.

* 'Mrs Siddons, in the "meridian of her glory," received one hundred pounds for eight nights (i. e. about twelve pounds per night). Mrs Jordan's salary, in her meridian, amounted to thirty guineas per week. John Kemble, when actor and manager at Covent Garden, was paid thirty-six pounds per week, Miss O'Neill, twenty-five pounds per week. George Cooke, twenty pounds. Lewis, twenty pounds, as actor and manager. Edwin, the best buffo and burletta singer that ever trod the stage, only fourteen pounds per week; and Mrs H. Siddons, by far the best representative of Juliet I ever saw, nine pounds per week. After this, may we not exclaim—

"Ye little stars! hide your diminished heads!"'

† 'There is no rule without an exception, and some first-rate performers have been certainly liberal enough not to adhere to the Cocker or Change alley—"a bargain's a bargain."'

‡ And long afterwards continued by Mr Henry Harris and Mr Elliston.

§ A cant term for new sights.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

TO C. R. H., ON HIS BELIEVING HIMSELF IN LOVE WITH MISS M., OF DRURY LANE.

Like that lone man that would have happy been,
But for a footmark stamped upon the sand,
That made him fear he was on savage land,
Art thou, my friend;—for if thou hadst not seen
By some unhappy chance thy Thespian Queen,
Th' inviting beauty of whose jewelled hand
Struck thee with love, like to some magic wand
Borne with an eye of gentleness,—I ween
Thou would'st not now be sorrowful, nor care
To think, with bitter happiness, of woe
And unregarded love, upon the fair
And bright-eyed Mordaunt.—Charles, I'd have ye know
That there are girls, by thousands, in the land,
Who have a jewelled heart, if not a jewelled hand.

DRURY-LANE.

LAST night a new tragic drama, called The Pledge, or Castilian Honour, was produced at this theatre, with great success. It is understood to be translated or borrowed (we know not which) from the French, by Mr KENNEY; and is of very striking and painful interest.

Charles of Spain, afterwards Emperor (Mr COOPER) is enamoured of Donna Zanthe (Miss PHILLIPS) an orphan residing with her kinsman the Duke de Sylva (MACREADY) who, in spite of his grey head, is in love with her too. She has secretly a third and a favoured lover, Hernani (Mr WALLACK) who, though a man of an illustrious origin, as well as a noble nature, is known only to the public as an outlaw and a rebel adventurer. In the course of the circumstances which mix up these parties with one another, the King avails himself of a signal which he has discovered, and entices Zanthe to a nocturnal interview. She argues with him, reproaches, implores;—finally she slips his dagger out of the sheath, and threatens him to proceed at his peril. The King tells her that her vehemence is to no purpose, since he has three followers at hand to assist in carrying her away. "You forget a fourth!" cries a voice. It is Hernani. Zanthe flies into his arms. A scene of altercation ensues between the King and the rebel, in which the former, in truly royal style, abuses the other for his lawlessness, and asserts the dignity of his own unjust character. He is suffered to depart with impunity. We then find Hernani in the disguise of a pilgrim, coming to the Duke's castle, and claiming his hospitality. It is granted him. Presently soft music is heard, and Donna Zanthe coming in, is hailed by her aged lover in the style of a bridegroom. She assumes that it is to be her bridal day; a display of bridal gifts on a table countenances his assertion; and the outlaw, in a transport of indignation, throws off his disguise, and invites the Duke's attendants to claim the price that has been set on his head. Not a soul moves. The Duke is a proud Castilian: he has promised the security of his roof to the adventurer, and he declares that his mansion shall not be sullied by a deed of inhospitality. Hernani is then (we do not see with what reason) left alone with his mistress, whom he reproaches with her falsehood. She tells him he is unjust, and takes from among the bridal ornaments, out of a casket, the dagger with which she threatened the King. Hernani is convinced; and the lovers are fondly embracing, when the Duke makes his re-appearance. The proud and jealous blood of old Don Leo (for such is his name) is roused to a pitch of frenzy at this sight. Hernani, who is as punctilious as he upon all Castilian points, grants that he has reason to complain, but refuses to accept a challenge from his host. The King at this juncture comes in, having got scent of the outlaw's visit, and demands him. The Duke, who has speeded his guest into a hiding place, refuses to give him up. The King says he must have either the outlaw or the Duke's life, or the lady as a pledge of his good behaviour. Donna Zanthe, secretly arming herself with the dagger, resolves to accompany the King, and departs with him. The outlaw is then summoned forth by the Duke, but still refusing to fight with an old man and one who has granted him his hospitality, yet acknowledging that he owes him some retribution for making love to his ward (of which, we confess, we do not see the "exquisite reason"), voluntarily makes him a present of a right over his life; which is the Pledge that we shall speak of by and bye. He informs his host, at the same time, to the latter's surprise and rage, that they two are not the only lovers of the lady, the King being a third, and a very urgent one. Don Leo, upon this, agrees to make common cause, so far, with his new foe-friend; and they leave the castle together to join certain discontented grandees and petty princes, who have leagued to cut off the King from his chance of attaining the Imperial Crown, then in a state of election. Over this conspiracy his Majesty triumphs in a style exceedingly "short and sweet," which we did not exactly comprehend. The conspirators have got him, as it were, in a corner; they are very powerful: he makes his appearance, and they might stab him at once. Instead of this, he summons forth at his convenience certain "merry men" of his subjects, and the whole formidable matter is at an end in a moment. The Dukes and Counts are disarmed; Don Leo and the outlaw find themselves reduced to the same state of incapacity; and the gentry who have a right to die in a polite manner, are ordered to separate themselves from the goats of plebeianism, and all to be executed forthwith. At this out comes the secret of Hernani. He is very angry at thinking he shall go to execution without his hat on, and so proclaims himself for "Don Juan of Arragon, Duke of Segovia, Marquis and Lord of some other place, Count of Alcantara, Viscount," &c. &c. who is of a blood as good as the King's,—who is the son of a father that was unjustly disgraced by the Court—and who has lived only to retrieve his fortunes. Meantime Donna Zanthe has come in, and is imploring the King for pardon. His Majesty says nothing to the pardon, but makes her a present of the forfeited estates, declaring her duchess of Segovia, Countess of Alcantara, &c. The outlaw remonstrates; the King smiles, and sends the lady into his arms, saying that it is in right of her husband, Don Juan of Arragon, that she possesses all these titles. In short, the hitherto unknown grandee is acknowledged and pardoned; the conspirators are all pardoned with him, that nothing may damp the greatness of the joy; and his Majesty, in an ecstasy of royal virtue, declares that henceforth he has done with unlawfulness, and that Spain, Flanders, and Germany shall be his only mistresses.

Here everything seems to be closed happily; nay, a little too happily for the tragic expectations of the audience; and people seemed to wonder whether the curtain was or was not to fall. Alas! the best and bitterest part of the drama was to come. Hitherto, there had been some gratuitous situations, and some interesting ones. The middle scenes had even been crowded with interest, though the latter ones had fallen off, and the speeches of the King and his courtiers become too lengthy. But now a fifth act was to ensue, full of greater dramatic effect than we have witnessed for years, and growing intenser every instant to the conclusion. This act opens with the bridal evening of Don Juan of Arragon and his mistress, who has some pretty affectionate lines put into her mouth (for the play is, for the most part, in blank verse). There is a serenade, a scene by moonlight, a scene in masks, a flitting of gay courtiers among the groves; and the bride, encircled by the arms of the bridegroom, says to him,

"——————— My lord! my life!
We suddenly inhabit another world."

They do; but only to be flung back upon a world blacker than before. Among the masquers has been observed a solitary one in a black cloak, who walks to and fro through the gaiety like a blight, and seeks the most lonely places. Some of the young courtiers, one after the other, go up to this figure, and accost it; but it says nothing. It only looks at them through its mask with two glaring eyes. At length, it is forgotten; the lovers are left alone; they linger a little in the sweet moonlight, to take leave of it; and cannot find words to express the transport of their new and most unlooked-for felicity. On a sudden, a horn is heard. The bridegroom starts. The bride rallies him, and playfully says, that he has been providing her with more music. The horn again. Don Juan's alarm increases. It amounts to terror. It begins to terrify his bride. What is it? It is this:—that when the outlaw gave the jealous Duke de Sylva a right over his life, he gave him also a horn as the Pledge of his word; and whenever this horn was blown, he was to be prepared to make the fatal sacrifice. Don Juan at length confesses to his bride that he shall have danger to encounter, and contrives to get rid of her for a moment by sending her for the dagger. The Duke, in his black cloak, then makes his appearance, and demands that his victim shall swallow poison. Donna Zanthe returns, discovers the horror of her position, and after entreating in vain for mercy, resolves upon dying with her husband. She contrives to get the phial of poison out of his hand, swallows half of it, and gives him, like another Arria, the remainder. This the poor bridegroom drinks, and they die, like another Romeo and Juliet, in extasies of woe and tenderness. The sable monster is all this while looking on. The moment they are both dead, remorse fastens upon him; he calls out for tortures and the rack; the people of the place come pouring in; and in the midst of the confusion, the curtain falls.

With some inequalities, already noticed, and not much to speak of in point of dialogue and poetry (though the language is always at good distance both from vulgarity and declamation) this is one of the most effective plays we remember to have seen,—at least in the second and third acts, and above all, in the conclusion. The fifth act, from the first ghostly appearance of the mask in black, to the agonizing deaths of the lovers, is truly fearful, the more so from the exquisite hour of happiness which is given only to be taken away. The house was in rapt attention. The applause was great and unmixed at the end, and vented itself in the most admiring terms all around you. To some the interest must have appeared almost too painful, and we confess we should have been among the number, had not the moral been so excellent. Castilian pride and jealousy are absurdities, it is true, which no longer exhibit themselves in their former flourishing state of venom; but the false principles which judge of everything by the tests of self-reference and a pampered egotism, which are so eager to avail themselves of any text of morality which they can twist to their purposes, and so ready to scatter dismay and destruction all around them, in revenge for sheer opposition to their will, can never be too strongly opposed, or shewn of what diabolical mistakes they consist. The Duke de Sylva, in this appalling story, is an honest and an honourable man after his generation, and yet he is willing to avail himself of his code of morality to indulge in the most infernal of passions, to pamper his spleen and jealousy by making victims of those who had as much right to happiness as himself (and more so, for they were young) and to subvert the very end of all the honour and virtue he pretended to love, by persisting in producing the worst end of vice,—misery. Such are the stupid woes inflicted by an absorption in a person's self, let the self-will and the jealousy shew themselves in what unrelenting fashion they please, Castilian or English,—whether in refusing to absolve the victim from a bloody oath, or in dropping upon its head the small, perpetual plague of a witless aversion. Reasons and moral pretence for the most inhuman crimes, are never wanting to the fools who chuse to find them.

A VISIT TO MICHAEL BOAI, &c.

TO THE TATLER.

Dear Mr Tatler,—Whether it be the obscurity of our climate, the fog of our smoke, or the mercantile dejection with which we look on things, we Londoners are so apt to see melancholy and uncomfortable faces, that a good-humoured one makes a strong impression on us. While we enjoy it as something pleasing, we admire it as a novelty. I was led to make this observation, by the pleasure I had in visiting that extraordinary enemy to his chin, Michael Boai. His wife, Mr Editor, has one of those pleasant, goodnatured expressions in her face, which you delight to speak of. Michael has a face, which though rather on the self-important principle, is worthy the vivacity of his spouse; and Signor Engels (who, by the the way, plays very nicely on the violin), is good-looking, aware of it, and resolved not to spoil it by any expression of imprudent disagreeableness.

Signor Joel may have been a very pleasant-looking person; but we should imagine that the friends of his boyhood would find some difficulty in recognizing their quondam companion: we mean, that it appeared to us, that the contortions which the lower part of his face must have undergone, during the immense practice necessary to arrive at that perfection of blow, whistle, growl, and snore, with which he astonishes people every day at three, have in some degree altered his face, sharpened his masticators, and given unto him the eye of the owl. More of him presently.

By way of being gallant, let us first mention the lady, who took but an inconsiderable part in the performances. She is, (as I have before said,) pretty, unassuming, and sings very nicely. Her higher notes are her best, and her intonation, as far as we could judge, was correct. Being at the back of the room, and not observing that she was seated, we were for shortening her a foot or two; but we afterwards found, that she was of reasonable stature, somewhat shorter than Michael; and Michael is not tall of his age.

The chin-melodist is said to have taken to practising on that instrument, for want of a penny to buy a jew's-harp. He had an uncontrollable propensity to music, from an early age, and could only indulge it by making a dulcimer of his face.

The following are his proceedings before commencing. He in the first place takes off his hat, which is an elegant improvement on that of the coal-heaver, and then developes a little box, into which he thrusts his knuckles, greasing with them his musical instrument. The violin then plays the introductory fugue, and Michael strikes up. His appearance, during the playing, is like that of a bad and infuriated boxer, obliged to hit his own face instead of his antagonist's. He shakes his head, looks vehement, and thumps his chin with ardour and exactitude. He can play the Chromatic scale, and can absolutely shake!!!—that is with his head.

We had been given to understand, that the sound which Michael produced resembled that of a musical-box. This is a libel on that fairy instrument; and we think there are few who have heard him but will agree with us in likening it to castanets; though we should say it beats them hollow. The power he possesses is absolutely extraordinary. The higher notes are, we think, the best; but he is never out of tune; and, when playing variations (as he did to "Nel cor piu non me sento") though he flourishes about, at a most extraordinary height, he gradually descends, hitting the original note with wonderful accuracy. He was most applauded in the Overture to 'Lodoiska,' though that applause was not extravagant: not that his performance did not warrant it, but the fashionables seem to look upon gloves as so very expensive, that they are willing to get a reputation for economy by observing a judicious silence. Madame Boai, who really sings very prettily, got no applause to speak of: which, as Mr Pepys would say, "was displeasing to observe." She and her husband seemed to entertain a mutual admiration of one another, which they occasionally testified by smiles, and other such evidences of a pleasing sympathy. Some of the songs which have his name to them in the bills are pretty, and he plays well on the guitar.

Signor Engels, a sort of auxiliary to Boai, plays very creditably on the violin. The Trio, in their national dresses, cut a picturesque appearance, especially when contrasted with the anti-elegant habiliments and extraordinary head-dresses of their audience.

Signor Joel is perhaps the most extraordinary of the four. He imitates birds, the skylark, thrush (which he at first told us he did not remember; "I have forgotten one," said he, "de trosh") the canary-bird, bullfinch, and the nightingale, &c. The bullfinch and thrush, which he afterwards gave us, were good; the nightingale excellent; though we missed the long, mellow, and beautiful note peculiar to that bird. Some of his tones were deliciously sweet. The canary-bird and the skylark, however, we looked upon as his master-pieces: the latter perhaps the best of the two. The imitation of the former was given in a sort of dialogue between the male and female. The long-drawn call of the male, and the answer of the female, with a beautiful string of notes which he sprinkled one after the other, were peculiarly effective. He signified when the skylark was ascending, by moving his fingers upwards; when in the air, by keeping them twittering at the same height; and when in coming down, by an analogous process. He shook us out a full crowd of notes, with wonderful rapidity and sweetness; and though they were not, as the poet so beautifully expresses it, "profuse strains of unpremeditated art," they were profuse, and very like their original.

Upon the whole, our party were much amused with their visit to these good-natured foreigners; and we recommend everybody, pecuniâ volente, to follow our example.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

A PROPHECY.

There is a mighty dawning on the earth,
Of human glory: dreams unknown before
Fill the mind's boundless world, and wondrous birth
Is given to great thought; and deep-drawn lore,
But late a hidden fount, at which a few
Quaff'd and were glad, is now a flowing river,
Which the parch'd nations may approach and view,
Kneel down and drink, or float in it for ever:
The bonds of Spirit are asunder broken,
And Matter makes a very sport of distance;
On every side appears a silent token
Of what will be hereafter, when existence
Shall even become a pure and equal thing,
And earth sweep high as heaven, on solemn wing.

A correspondent, from whom we were glad to hear, informs us, that Mr Clarkson's forthcoming lectures on the progress and prospects of society, will embrace some curious theories respecting the origin and tendency of social institutions. One feature of his lectures, will be an argument to show that the co-operative system entered into the constitution of all the most eminent early republics; that it may be traced to the first germs of social tendencies in a savage state; that as society began with it in its roughest form, so it tends towards it in its most refined development; and that it is not improbable that the last institutions of the human race, some centuries hence, may realise the eloquent apostrophe of Godwin to Lycurgus. "To this we come, oh illustrious legislator! Labour sufficient to procure all things, for all will be subdivided and comparatively nothing. It will be no longer necessary that some men should be toiling slaves, in order that others may be idle freemen. Machines will be the only helots of the last universal freemen."—We shall shortly have another word or two to say of these lectures.

EXTRACTS FROM NEW BOOKS.

PART OF A WALK THROUGH MADRID IN SEARCH OF LODGINGS.

Passing on, we came to a long row of calesines, a kind of gig, of grotesque Dutch figure. Many were oddly painted with the church of Buen Suceso, the fountain of the Sibyl, or the Virgin Mary on the back, and were named accordingly. They were furthermore profusely studded with brass tacks, and so was the harness of the horse, usually a long-tailed Andalusian, decorated with many bells, tassels, and a long plume of red woollen, erect between his ears. As for the drivers themselves, they wore hats adorned with buckles, beads, and tassels, jacket and breeches of velvet, worsted stockings, and long-quartered shoes. Each had a second jacket, either drawn on over the other, or more commonly, hanging negligently from the left shoulder. This was of brown cloth, singularly decorated with embroidered patches of red or yellow cloth, to protect the elbows, a tree and branches of the same upon the back, and, in front, instead of buttons, loops and cords, pointed with brass or silver, which were attached to strengthening pieces of red, in the shape of hearts. These caleseros were grouped together about the doors of the tabernas, cracking their whips and their jokes together. Nor did they fail to make us proffers of their services, calling our attention to the elegance of a calesa, and the good points of the caballo. The merry mood, hyperbolical language, and fantastic dress of these fellows, so greatly at variance with the habitual gravity of the Castilian, bespoke them natives of the mercurial region of Andalusia. Leaving this row of vehicles behind, we came to the Puerta del Sol. This is an open place in the heart of Madrid, where eight of the principal streets come together, and where the city may be said to have its focus. In the centre, is a fountain, from which the neighbourhood receives its supply of water. One of the forks is formed by the parish church of Buen Suceso, and the others by the Post office, and a variety of shops and dwellings. In former times it was the eastern gate of the city; hence its name of Gate of the Sun; but when the court came to Madrid, the nobility who followed in its train, constructed their palaces in the open plain to the east, so that Puerta del Sol, from being the extremity, became the centre of Madrid. From hence are streets leading directly to almost any place of which you may be in search; and put yourself in any street at the extremities of the city, and it is sure to discharge you here. In this way, all Madrid passes daily through this centre of circulation, so that a stranger may station himself here, and see the population of the whole capital passing as it were in review before him. Here the exchange is each day held, and the trader comes to talk of his affairs: the politician, rolled in his cloak, signifies, by a shrug, a significant look, or a whisper, the news which with us would be told with the hands in the breeches pockets, the legs striding apart, and the voice lifted up in loud declamation. Hither the elegante is mechanically drawn to shew off the last Parisian mode, or the idle thief, enveloped in his dingy cloak, to talk to a comrade of old achievements, or to plan future crimes and depredations. Here are constantly passing flocks of sheep and droves of swine going to the shambles, mules and asses laden with straw or charcoal or dead kids hooked by the legs, and always on the very end of the last beast of each row, a rough clad fellow, singing out with a grave accent on the last syllable, "Paja! paja! carbon! cabrito!"—Straw! straw! coals! kids! There are moreover, old women with oranges or pomegranates pushing their way through the crowd, and scolding those who run against their baskets; also aguadores, with jars of water, who deafen you with cries of "Quien quiere agua?"—Who wants water? Nor do beggars fail to frequent this resort, especially the blind, who vociferate some ballad which they have for sale, or demand alms in a peremptory tone and in the name of Maria Santissima. Here, too, may be seen all the costumes of Spain; the long red cap of the Catalans; the Valencian with his blanket, and airy bragas, though in the midst of winter; the Montera cap of the Manchego; the leathern cuirass of the old Castilian; the trunk hose of the Leones; the coarse garb and hobnailed shoes of the Gallego; and the round hat and embroidered finery of Andalusia. Nor does the Puerta del Sol fail to witness prouder sights than these. At one moment it is a regiment of the Royal Guard, going to review; in the next, a trumpet sounds, and the drums of the neighbouring picquets are heard beating the call. The coaches and six approach, guarded by a splendid accompaniment. The cry of "Los Reges" passes from mouth to mouth; and the Spaniards, unrolling their cloaks and doffing their hats, give place for the "Absolute King." Presently a bell rings, and every voice is hushed. A long procession of men, with each a burning taper, is seen, preceding a priest, who is carrying the reconciling sacrament to smooth the way for some dying sinner. Does it meet a carriage, though containing the first grandee of Spain, the owner descends, throws himself upon his knees in the middle of the street, and offers his carriage for the conveyance of the host. "Su majestad,"—His majesty!—to indicate the presence of the Saviour sacramentized, passes in a tremulous whisper from lip to lip. The faithful are all uncovered and kneeling, they smite their breasts with contrition, and hold down their heads as if unworthy to look upon the Lamb.

The unpleasant reflections excited by this rencontre were soon banished by strains of music, and the clatter of advancing hoofs. The body of cavalry which now attracted the attention of the multitude in Puerta del Sol, and for which a passage was soon opened by the long-bearded sappers who marched in front, was a regiment of lancers of the royal guard; a beautiful and well mounted corps in Polish uniforms, with high schakos, each bearing a lance decorated with a red and white pennon. Next came a band of some thirty musicians playing that most beautiful piece "Di piacer mi balza il cor," from the Gazza Ladra of Rossini. I thought I had never heard any sounds so delightful: even the ardor of the horses seemed lulled by them. Presently however the cadence passed into a blast far livelier than the lovesong of Ninetta, and away they went at a gallop in the direction of the Prado.

Immediately behind the lancers came a regiment of cuirassiers mounted chiefly on powerful steeds, with long sweeping tails, and manes parted in the middle and flowing on both sides the whole width of the neck. The men were stout, fine looking fellows, incased in jackboots, with Grecian helmets, and cuirasses of steel, on the front of which were gilded images of the sun. Their offensive weapons consisted of stout horse pistols, and straight sabres of great length from the royal armoury of Toledo. There was to be a review on the Prado, and having always been fond of listening to music, and looking at the soldiers, I proposed that we should see it. Don Diego was one of those ready fellows of idle mood, and ample leisure, who are pleased with every proposition, so we went at once in quest of the soldiery. The review took place near the convent of Atocha. The Minister of War, with a brilliant staff mounted on splendid barbs from the meadows of the Tagus or the Guadalquivir, was posted in front of the convent, and received the salutations of the passing soldiery. It was one of those bright and cloudless days so common in the elevated region of Madrid. The sun shone full upon polished helmets, cuirasses, and sabres, or flickered round the ends of the lances, while the combined music of both corps, stationed at the point about which the platoons wheeled in succession, sent forth a martial melody.

The display was a brilliant one, and I enjoyed it without reservation. I looked not to the extortion and misery which among the industrious classes must pay for this glitter and pageantry; to the cause of injustice and oppression it might be called to support; to the rapine and murder, the famine and pestilence, the thousand crimes and thousand curses, that follow in the train of armies.—A Year in Spain.

CORK TREES.

This useful production is known in Spain by the name of "alcornoque." It is a species of the encina, which, although of very different appearance from our oak, furnishes a wood of the same grain, and produces acorns, which are not so bitter as ours, and which, as an article of food, the poorer classes do not always abandon to the hogs. Thus we are told that Sancho was a great lover of bellotas. The cork-tree grows to the height of our apple-tree, and spreads its branches much in the same manner, but the trunk is of much greater dimensions, and the foliage of a more gloomy hue. Its trunk and branches are covered with a thick ragged bark, which would seem to indicate disease. The trunk alone, however, furnishes a bark of sufficient thickness to be of use in the arts. It is first stript away in the month of July, when the tree is fifteen years old, but is then of no use except to burn, and is only removed for the sake of producing a stouter growth. In the course of six or eight years the inner bark is grown into a cork of marketable quality, and continues to yield, at similar intervals, for more than a century.—The same.

A SUSPICIOUS MESSENGER.

Here (at Bouyoukdéré) we became acquainted with the hospodar of Wallachia, Prince Caragia, whom a singular turn of fortune had recently placed on the hospodarian throne. He was about to proceed to his principality, and invited me to visit him at Buchorest, where I little thought at that time, I should, in a few months, have occasion to proceed. The circumstances which led to the unexpected choice made of Caragia on this occasion are in too many respects interesting, to be passed over with a mere allusion to them. They were so many times related to me by well-informed persons at Constantinople, that the reader may rely on the statement of them, which I am about to offer to his perusal. * * * * * Sultan Mahmoud, who was a complete stranger to the pretensions of all the contending parties, very wisely resolved to accept none of the candidates offered to his notice under the auspices of French and Russian protection. He therefore desired his confidential minister, Halett-Effendi, to look out for some Greek of the Fannar, who was qualified for the appointment, and who had never connected himself with any foreign party. The venerable and much-respected prince Demetrius Ghika, son of a former hospodar of Moldavia, living in obscurity and poverty, with a numerous family, in one of the most retired villages near the Bosphorus, had, in former days of prosperity, been the friend and patron of Halett-Effendi, for whom he laid the foundation of the power he was now exercising, as the favorite companion and confidential adviser of the sultan. Halett thought of his benefactor Ghika on this occasion, proposed him to the sultan, and was commanded to send for him and intimate to him that the sultan's choice had fallen on him. The messenger despatched to Ghika to require his attendance, was one of the personages whose outward insignia of office announced him to be a capigee-bashi, or chamberlain, to whom the task is always intrusted of notifying his master's good-will and pleasure that certain persons should not continue to endure the miseries of life. Ghika did not happen to be at home on his arrival, and as the capigee-bashi appeared disposed to wait until he saw him, the whole family were seized with consternation, and secret messengers were despatched in all directions to prevent his return home. Halett-Effendi, after several days fruitless efforts to find out his old friend, was at length obliged to give up all thoughts of him; and as time pressed, and it was necessary to get rid of the importunities of the Russian and French embassies, by the announcement that the appointment had been filled up with a person of the sultan's own choice, Hallet-Effendi then thought of this Caragia, who was also living in obscurity and great poverty, and who had never occupied any conspicuous office. Caragia answered the summons with more alacrity than Ghika, and immediately received the glad tidings of his approaching elevation. I have been assured by persons who were well acquainted with Caragia and his family, that, until the day when he was informed of the good fortune which awaited him, he was in such a state of poverty, that his daughters were under the necessity of knitting stockings and purses for the purpose of earning the means of a scanty livelihood, and that frequently the whole family lived, for weeks, upon olives and brown bread.—Journal of a Nobleman.

A NEW TRAP FOR THIEVES.

The road from Fragett to Lobosh had some years ago been rendered very unsafe, in consequence of its being made the scene of operations of a band of brigands who for a long time hovered about the confines of Transylvania, and of the Bannat of Temesvar. After a great number of fruitless efforts to find out the place of their retreat, it was discovered in a curious way. A shepherd from the neighbouring mountains was observed to come to Lobosh regularly once a week, and buy up a large quantity of wine, which he took back with him. Suspicion was at length awakened by the frequency and regularity of his purchases, and he was one day seized and brought before the governor of the district, who, by dint of threats and promises, succeeded in extorting from him the avowal, that he was the purveyor of the troop of robbers that had so long infested the neighbourhood. It appeared from his statement, that their number was about one hundred, and that the place of their retreat and concealment was one of the extensive caverns of which a great number exist in this part of Transylvania. They had so fortified the entrance of this cavern, that it appeared to the governor that the lives of a great number of the assailants must be sacrificed by any open attack upon it. Stratagem was therefore resolved on. The shepherd received a positive promise of oblivion, and of a pension for life, of a hundred florins, if he would co-operate with the governor, and not let the robbers suspect that they had been betrayed. Glad enough to save his neck on such terms, he promised to do everything that would be required of him; and as a guarantee for his good faith, he placed his wife and children as hostages in the governor's hands. He was then ordered to proceed to the cavern, with the accustomed supply of wine, into which a sufficient quantity of opium was infused. The banditti got drunk as usual: and when they awoke on the following morning, they found themselves within the walls of the prison of Lobosh. They were afterwards hung in chains on the very mountain under which was situated the cavern they had selected as their habitation.—The same.

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

MATRIMONY.—"They manage these things differently in France." The following advertisement appeared in the Constitutionnel in the course of the last week. We give name and number, for the information of travelling bachelors from England:—"Marriage.—Madame Houdard has succeeded, by zeal and discretion, in causing the torch of Hymen to be lighted, and in matching with promptness those who have addressed themselves to her.—Rue Ste. Appoline, No. 4."

INTELLIGENT DIGNITARIES.—Two worthy deacons in a neighbouring Burgh, talking of the reform measure, thus addressed each other:—"But, dear me, Mr ———, though you are against reform, every one is not of your opinion—you're but a mere individual." "What do you say, Sir!" replied Mr ———, "do you call me an individual?—then I say, Sir, that you are the same;" and turning his back on his opponent, marched off, highly delighted with having repaid the supposed insult.—Scotch Paper.

EMPIRICS.—Were we to judge by what we see and hear, by the number of the empirics with which we are infested, by the silence of the law on the offences they commit, and by the very general encouragement which they obtain from our enlightened countrymen, one would imagine that medicine was nothing better than a game of chances, which every fool may gain at, and that physicians are little better than useless incumbrances, which merit neither protection nor reward.—Westminster Review for April.

LEGAL PRECAUTION.—The late Lord Clonmel, who never thought of demanding more than 1s. for an affidavit, used to be well satisfied provided it was a good one. In his time the Birmingham shillings were current, and he used the following extraordinary precaution to avoid being imposed upon by taking a bad one:—"You shall true answer make to such questions as shall be demanded of you touching this affidavit, so help you God. Is this a good shilling? Are the contents of this affidavit true? Is this your name and handwriting?"—Legal Observer.

FRENCH PLAYS.

TO THE TATLER.

MR TATLER,—Suffer me to repair an involuntary breach of gallantry of which I have been guilty. The fashion I see is, in certain play-bills, to give precedence to the women,—like the old-fashioned ones, I gave it to the men. If you please, I will repair, all I can, so great a blunder. Madame Albert disappointed me, in what I may call the serious of French sentiment,—the effects of disappointed love. She wants both simplicity and power;—she studies too much, and has not the art to conceal her art: indeed, that is an impossibility, when actor or actress aims at producing effect by studying attitude, and not by giving way to the impulse excited naturally in the mind by the thought or action to be represented; this is so obvious, the actor should know it by intention almost. Madame Albert, however, does not rant; and, with more attention to nature, she would be a pleasing little actress. Her face is round, and rather plain, but expressive; though owing to the smallness of her features, the expression, except near to the stage, is lost in a great measure. In those light comic pieces in which the French so excel, she is very delightful, full of sprightliness and glee; it is, to my mind, in these little things that she excels,—though from the number of handkerchiefs put in requisition during the representation of Isaure, and of Valentine as well, I fancy I must admit, that, like the Ministerial majority, I am in a minority of one. She sings very prettily. Mademoiselle St Ange is a charming creature, and a picquant actress—so vivacious, so arch—she looks, too, unutterable things; and she trips so lightly about, she must have a heart teeming with gaiety and good humour,—but she can be shrewish: witness Blanchette, in Isaure. I like her fine lady characters least; she cannot throw off her nature and archness; and to discard nature is the finest effort your fine lady makes, and must accomplish, or she has no pretension to the character; if Mademoiselle St Ange is a pretender, she will take this as no compliment, of course. Mademoiselle Eliza personates young gentlemen cleverly; but still there is a womanishness about her, which she cannot conceal; and I never like to see a woman attempt to disguise it. But why are women thrusted into men's characters?—thrusted, by the way, is a Cobbettism,—but I swear by his admirable little grammar written for plough-boys. I hate to see a female in men's apparel—true, young boys formerly played the parts of women, but that has been discarded—and why perpetuate the worse habit of the two? Mademoiselle Florval is a pretty mannerist; and Mademoiselle Jamain can be arch and natural. Cloup is an excellent representative of the old gentleman of the old school, going, if not gone, whither I hope it will never return—along with the old order of things. I like Preval: there is much humour in him. It would be unpardonable to pass over M. Gamard, whose comic powers appear to me to be of the highest order; he never descends to broad farce, and yet he is irresistibly comic, because he never exceeds the modesty of nature;—that is the charm in everything. M. Alfred, too, makes a capital lover,—I have but just been made aware how well he is adapted to represent the character,—I like him none the worse for it, and trust the allusion may be excused. If men were true, as well as loving, what a being would man be! The sentiment is Shakspeare's—I forget the lines. Excuse the bit of Utilitarianism I would tag to it: if men were true, of how much misery would they avoid the infliction! I wish the world would agree to stamp him as of a bad heart, and to be shunned, who conceives of woman, that their existence is for the gratification alone of a passion which, licentiously indulged, degrades the Lord of the Creation beneath the brute that perisheth. I have been excessively disappointed in seeing so comparatively few English faces at the French Plays, which, as introducing sociabilities and pleasures common to most men, must tend to soften down, and I would fain hope in the end, obliterate, those bloody and bitter asperities, which, for the gain of the few, have been most sordidly, and basely, and wickedly engendered between two neighbouring people for centuries. Ever your's, faithfully, PAGANINI.—It is said that one of the concerts given at the Opera in Paris, by Signor Paganini, produced him 16,500 francs. An amateur has made the following calculation upon this amount. The performer played during the evening three pieces, each covering about five pages of music, of six rows, giving about 91 measures to the page. The fifteen pages thus contained 1,365 measures, by which the 16,500 francs are to be divided. The quotient will be 12 francs for each measure, or the proportions will be as follow :—For a round, 12f ; a minim, or white note, 6f.; a black note, 3f.; a crotchet, 1f. 50c.; a double crotchet, 15 sous; a triple crotchet, 7½ sous. And, on the other hand :—For a pause, 15f.; a demi pause, 6f.; a minim rest, 3f.; a demi rest, 1f. 50c.; a quarter of a rest, 75c. There would still, out of the 16,500 francs, remain 420 francs, which is exactly the price of such a violin as the Conservatory awards as a prize to its most distinguished pupils.—Le Furet de Londres.

— Policy induced Bonaparte to re-establish religious worship in France, which he thought would be a powerful aid to the consolidation of his power; but he would never consent to the persecution of other religions. He wished to influence mankind in positive and temporal things, but not in points of belief.—Bourrienne's Memoirs.

— There are, besides the temper of our climate, two things peculiar to us, that contribute much to the beauty and elegance of our gardens; which are the gravel of our walks, and the fineness and almost perpetual greenness of our turf: the first is not known anywhere else, which leaves all their dry walks in other countries, very unpleasant and uneasy; the other cannot be found in France or in Holland as we have it, the soil not admitting that fineness of blade in Holland, nor the sun that greenness in France, during most of the summer; nor indeed is it to be found but in the finest of our soils.—Temple on Gardening.

DOMESTIC INSTRUCTION.

A GENTLEWOMAN whose residence adjoins Kensington Gardens, and who has brought up and educated a large family, being at present découvrè from her sons having gone out into the world, wishes to RECEIVE into her domestic circle, now consisting only of herself and daughter, TWO LITTLE BOYS, from five to ten years of age, whom she would instruct in the Latin Accidence, and such rudiments as are fitted to prepare them for large or public schools. This arrangement is particularly desirable for little boys whose delicacy of constitution may unfit them for encountering the habits and discipline of a school. The advertiser has been accustomed to pay great attention to the health of her own children, and the same care would be extended to those confided to her charge.—Address A. B. AN AUTOBIOGRAPHICAL HINT.

[From Mr Godwin's Thought on Man, &c. lately published.]

The following essay will be to a considerable degree in the nature of confession, like the confessions of St Augustine or of Jean Jacques Rousseau. It may therefore at first sight appear of small intrinsic value, and scarcely worthy of a place in the present series. But, as I have had occasion more than once to remark, we are all of us framed in a great measure on the same model, and the analysis of the individual may often stand for the analysis of a species. While I describe myself, therefore, I shall probably at the same time be describing no inconsiderable number of my fellow-beings.

It is true, that the duty of man under the head of Frankness, is of a very comprehensive nature. We ought all of us to tell to our neighbour whatever it may be of advantage to him to know, we ought to be the sincere and zealous advocates of absent merit and worth, and we are bound by every means in our power to contribute to the improvement of others, and to the diffusion of salutary truths through the world.

From the universality of these precepts many readers might be apt to infer, that I am in my own person the bold and unsparing preacher of truth, resolutely giving to every man his due, and, agreeably to the apostle's direction, "instant in season, and out of season." The individual who answers to this description will often be deemed troublesome, often annoying; he will produce a considerable sensation in the circle of those who know him; and it will depend upon various collateral circumstances, whether he shall ultimately be judged a rash and intemperate diturber of the contemplations of his neighbours, or a disinterested aud heroic suggester of new veins of thinking, by which his contemporaries and their posterity shall be essentially the gainers.

I have no desire to pass myself upon those who may have any curiosity respecting me for better than I am; and I will therefore here put down a few particulars, which may tend to enable them to form an equitable judgment.

One of the earliest passions of my mind was the love of truth and sound opinion. "Why should I," such was the language of my solitary meditations, "because I was born in a certain degree of latitude, in a certain century, in a country where certain institutions prevail, and of parents professing a certain faith, take it for granted that all this is right?—This is matter of accident. "Time and chance happeneth to all:" and I, the thinking principle within me, might, if such had been the order of events, have been born under circumstances the very reverse of those under which I was born. I will not, if I can help it, be the creature of accideut; I will not, like a shuttle-cock, be at the disposal of every impulse that is given me." I felt a certain disdain for the being thus directed; I could not endure the idea of being made a fool of, and of taking every ignis fatuus for a guide, and every stray notion, the meteor of the day, for everlasting truth. I am the person, spoken of in a preceding Essay, who early said to Truth, "Go on: whithersoever thou leadest, I am prepared to follow."

During my college-life, therefore, I read all sorts of books, on every side of any important question, or that were thrown in my way, that I could hear of. But the very passion that determined me to this mode of proceeding, made me wary and circumspect in coming to a conclusion. I knew that it would, if anything, be a more censurable and contemptible act, to yield to every seducing novelty, than to adhere obstinately to a prejudice because it had been instilled into me in youth. I was therefore slow of conviction, and by no means "given to change." I never willingly parted with a suggestion that was unexpectedly furnished to me; but I examined it again and again, before I consented that it should enter into the set of my principles.

In proportion, however, as I became acquainted with truth, or what appeared to me to be truth, I was like what I have read of Melancthon, who, when he was first converted to the tenets of Luther, became eager to go into all companies, that he might make them partakers of the same inestimable treasures, and set before them evidence that was to him irresistible. It is needless to say, that he often encountered the most mortifying disappointment.

Young and eager as I was in my mission, I received in this way many a bitter lesson. But the peculiarity of my temper rendered this doubly impressive to me. I could not pass over a hint, let it come from what quarter it would, without taking it into some consideration, and endeavouring to ascertain the precise weight that was to be attributed to it. It would however often happen, particularly in the question of the claims of a given individual to honour and respect, that I could see nothing but the most glaring injustice in the opposition I experienced. In canvassing the character of an individual, it is not for the most part general, abstract or moral, principles that are called into question: I am left in possession of the premises which taught me to admire the man whose character is contested; and conformably to those premises I see that his claim to the honour I have paid him is fully made out.

In my communications with others, in the endeavour to impart what I deemed to be truth, I began with boldness: but I often found that the evidence that was to me irresistible, was made small account of by others; and it not seldom happened, as candour was my principle, and a determination to receive what could be shewn to be truth, let it come from what quarter it would, that suggestions were presented to me, materially calculated to stagger the confidence with which I had set out. If I had been divinely inspired, if I had been secured by an omniscient spirit against the danger of error, my case would have been different. But I was not inspired. I often encountered an opposition I had not anticipated, and was often presented with objections, or had pointed out to me flaws and deficiencies in my reasonings, which, till they were so pointed out, I had not apprehended. I had not lungs enabling me to drown all contradiction; and, which was still more material, I had not a frame of mind, which should determine me to regard whatever could be urged against me as of no value. I therefore became cautious. As a human creature, I did not relish the being held up to others, or to myself, as rash, inconsiderate, and headlong, unaware of difficulties the most obvious, embracing propositions the most untenable, and "against hope believing in hope." And, as an apostle of truth, I distinctly perceived that a reputation for perspicacity and sound judgment was essential to my mission. I therefore often became less a speaker than a listener, and by no means made it a law with myself to defend principles and characters I honoured, on every occasion on which I might hear them attacked.

A new epoch occurred in my character, when I published, and at the time I was writing, my 'Enquiry concerning Political Justice.' My mind was wrought up to a certain elevation of tone; the speculations in which I was engaged, tending to embrace all that was most important to man in society, and the frame to which I had assiduously bent myself, of giving quarter to nothing because it was old, and shrinking from nothing because it was startling and astounding, gave a new bias to my character. The habit which I thus formed put me more on the alert even in the scenes of ordinary life, and gave me a boldness and an eloquence more than was natural to me. I then reverted to the principle which I stated in the beginning, of being ready to tell my neighbour whatever it might be of advantage to him to know, to shew myself the sincere and zealous advocate of absent merit and worth, and to contribute, by every means in my power, to the improvement of others and to the diffusion of salutary truths through the world. I desired that every hour that I lived should be turned to the best account, and was bent each day to examine whether I had conformed myself to this rule. I held on this course with tolerable constancy for five or six years: and, even when that constancy abated, it failed not to leave a beneficial effect on my subsequent conduct.

But, in pursuing this scheme of practice, I was acting a part somewhat foreign to my constitution. I was by nature more of a speculative than an active character, more inclined to reason within myself upon what I heard and saw, than to declaim concerning it. I loved to sit by unobserved, and to meditate upon the panorama before me. At first I associated chiefly with those who were more or less admirers of my work; and, as I had risen (to speak in the slang phrase) like "a star" upon my contemporaries without being expected, I was treated generally with a certain degree of deference, or, where not with deference and submission, yet as a person whose opinions and view of things were to be taken into the account. The individuals who most strenuously opposed me, acted with a consciousness that, if they affected to despise me, they must not expect that all the bystanders would participate in that feeling.

But this was to a considerable degree the effect of novelty. My lungs, as I have already said, were not of iron; my manner was not overbearing and despotic; there was nothing in it to deter him who differed from me from entering the field in turn, and telling the tale of his views and judgments in contradiction to mine. I descended into the arena, and stood on a level with the rest. Beyond this, it occasionally happened that, if I had not the stentorian lungs, and the petty artifices of rhetoric and conciliation, that should carry a cause independently of its merits, my antagonists were not deficient in these respects. I had nothing in my favour to balance this, but a sort of constitutional equanimity and imperturbableness of temper, which, if I was at any time silenced, made me not look like a captive to be dragged at the chariot-wheels of my adversary.

All this, however, had a tendency to subtract from my vocation as a missionary. I was no longer a knight-errant, prepared on all occasions by dint of arms to vindicate the cause of every principle that was unjustly handled, and every character that was wrongfully assailed. Meanwhile, I returned to the field, occasionally and uncertainly. It required some provocation and incitement to call me out; but there was the lion, or whatever combative animal may more justly prefigure me, sleeping, and that might be awakened.

There is another feature necessary to be mentioned, in order to make this a faithful representation. There are persons, it should seem, of whom it may be predicated, that they are semper parati. This has by no means been my case. My genius often deserted me. I was far from having the thought, the argument, or the illustration at all times ready, when it was required. I resembled to a certain degree the persons we read of, who are said to be struck as if with a divine judgment. I was for a moment changed into one of the mere herd, de grege porcus. My powers therefore were precarious; and I could not always be the intrepid and qualified advocate of truth, if I vehemently desired it. I have often, a few minutes afterwards, or on my return to my chambers, recollected the train of thinking, which would have shewn me off to advantage, and memorably done me honour, if I could have had it at my command the moment it was wanted.

And so much for confession. I am by no means vindicating myself. I honor much more the man who is at all times ready to tell his neighbour whatever it may be of advantage to him to know, to shew himself the sincere and untemporising advocate of absent merit and worth, aud to contribute by every means in his power to the improvement of others, and to the diffusion of salutary truths through the world.

This is what every man ought to be, and what the best devised scheme of republican institutions would have a tendency to make us all.

But, though the man here described is to a certain degree a deserter of his true place in society, and cannot be admitted to have played his part in all things well, we are by no means to pronounce upon him a more unfavourable judgment than he merits. Diffidence, though, where it disqualifies us in any way from doing justice to truth, either as it respects general principle or individual character, a defect, yet is on no account to be confounded in demerit with that suppression of truth, or misrepresentation, which grows out of actual craft and design.

The diffident man, in some cases seldomer, and in some oftener and in a more glaring manner, deserts the cause of truth, and by that means is the cause of misrepresentation, and indirectly the propagator of falsehood. But he is constant and sincere as far as he goes; he never lends his voice to falsehood, or intentionally to sophistry; he never for an instant goes over to the enemy's standard, or disgraces his honest front by shewing it in the ranks of tyranny or imposture. He may undoubtedly be accused, to a certain degree of dissimulation, or throwing into shade the thing that is, but never of simulation, or the pretending the thing to be that is not. He is plain and uniform in everything that he professes, or to which he gives utterance; but, from timidity or irresolution, he keeps back in part the offering which he owes at the shrine where it is most honourable and glorious for man to worship.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

A LAMENT.

Where is She—whom Fortune dowered
With the virgin wealth of Youth,
Beauty, and the love of Truth,
Golden Honour, spotless Fame,
Twenty-times-transmitted Name?
Where is She?—Alas! she's dead:
Dead, alas! and on her head
The cold and crumbling earth is showered.
Not a stone is at her feet,
Not a bud with summer sweet
Shrinketh on her winding-sheet;
Not a line to tell her tale!
Yet, what doth that poor want avail?
The sad-eyed widow, Pity pale,
Weepeth when her story's told,—
How her love was left for gold,
How, deserted and betrayed,
Underneath the green grass laid,
She left him, whose sordid pride

ATMOSPHERIC LETTER-CARRYING.—A curious model of a tunnel, through which the mail-bags might be projected, is now exhibiting in Glasgow by a Mr Reid. According to a calculation by Professor Stevelley, of Belfast, twelve minutes would be sufficient to transmit the letter-bags from London to Portsmouth, a distance of 70 miles!

MYSTERIOUS NUMBERS. — All those mysterious things they observe in numbers, come to nothing, upon this very ground; because number in itself is nothing, has not to do with nature, but is merely of human imposition, a mere sound: for example, when I cry "one o'clock, two o'clock, three o'clock," that is but one division of time; the time itself goes on, and it had been all one in nature if those hours had been called nine, ten, and eleven. So when they say the seventh son is fortunate, it means nothing; for if you count from the seventh backwards, then the first is the seventh: why is not he likewise fortunate?—Selden.

— Fox was one day expatiating to a company, in which Sheridan was present, on the impossibility of paying off the National Debt. "In fact," said he, "the creditors of the nation stand as little chance of being paid as ——"—he paused for a strong illustration, ere he could find one Sheridan supplied it—"your own."

FRANKING LETTERS.—Of the privilege of franking letters, the following curious anecdote is recorded in the 23d volume of the "Parliamentary History." It occurred in the debate on the Post-office Bill, in the year 1660:—"Col. Titus reported the bill for the settlement of the Post-office, with the amendments. Sir Walter Earl delivered a proviso for the letters of all Members of Parliament to go free during the sitting. Sir Heneage Finch said, 'It was a poor mendicant proviso, and below the honour of the House.' Mr Prynne spoke also against the proviso. Mr Bunckley, Mr Boscawen, Sir George Downing, and Serjeant Charlton, for it; the latter saying, 'the Counsel's letters were free.' The question being called for, the Speaker, Sir Harbottle Grimstone, was unwilling to put it, saying he was ashamed of it; nevertheless, the proviso was carried, and made part of the bill, which was ordered to be engrossed. The Lords subsequently disagreed to this proviso, and it was ultimately thrown out. At a subsequent period, however, both Houses did not feel it to be below their honour to secure for themselves this exemption from postage."

PRESSURE AT GREAT DEPTHS IN THE SEA.—If an empty bottle, or rather one containing only air, be tightly corked, and be sunk by weights attached to it, to a considerable depth in the sea, the pressure of the surrounding water will either break the bottle, or force the cork into it through the neck. On drawing up the bottle, it will be found to be filled with water, and to have the cork within it below the neck. If the bottle have flat sides, and be square bottomed, it will be broken by the pressure, the form being unfavourable to strength; but if it be round, it will be more likely to resist the pressure, and to have the cork forced in. The shape in this case is conducive to strength, partaking of the qualities of an arch. Lardner's Cyclopædia.

FRENCH COOKERY.—I fancy the French would make the best cooks in the world if they had but good meat; as it is they can dress you out five different dishes from a nettle-top; seven from a dock-leaf; and twice as many from a frog's haunches; they eat prettily enough when one is used to them—are easy of digestion, and seldom overload the stomach with crudities.—Goldsmith's Citizen of the World.

THE ATTACK ON THE ROTTEN TREE.—A very clever caricature has recently appeared, printed on silk, in the shape of a pocket-handkerchief. It is entitled "the attack of the reformers on the old rotten tree, or the foul nests of the cormorants in danger." The reformers are represented chopping down a large tree, on which is inscribed "rotten borough system." The Dukes of Wellington and Newcastle, the Marquis of Chandos, and Lords Eldon and Ellenberough, and Mr Peel, are attempting to prop it up, exclaiming "You take our house when you do take away the prop that doth sustain our house: you take our lives when you do take the means whereby we live," The branches of the tree are full of nests, intended to represent the different rotten boroughs, each nest containing one or two cormorants, apparently screaming in alarm at their approaching destruction. The likenesses of Lord John Russell, Lord Brougham, Lord Grey, Sir Francis Burdett, and the other principal characters are very good. Their Majesties appear in the back ground, standing on Constitution Hill, receiving the thanks and congratulations of their subjects.—Daily Paper.

THE SLAVE TRADE.—The slave-trade is here (the Bay of Benguela, on the western coast of Africa), carried on to a great extent. On our arrival we found seven vessels lying in the bay, with the undisguised purpose of receiving a cargo of human flesh—in fact, three of them were swarming with these wretched victims of their fellow-creatures' cupidity. Every evening, after their scanty repast, they were allowed to walk for a short time upon deck, when they appeared so close, that with difficulty they were enabled to move; below, the sufferings of these poor creatures must have been very great, judging by their numbers, and the compass in which they were confined. The profit arising from this inhuman traffic is a strong inducement for its continuance. The inhabitant Portuguese first buy them from the native chiefs for about five dollars, or commodities of that value in the opinion of the savage, but which, in England, would be purchased for as many halfpence. The Portuguese then sell them to the different vessels for about eight times the sum given to the native. As no slaves are exported without the Governor's sanction, I imagine some duty to be paid him upon them. This is, in a great measure, confirmed by his encouraging the trade by every possible means, and his precautions that no illicit traffic may be carried on, to prevent which a night-boat is constantly on the look-out. If we consider the Government under which he works, it is not an improbable conclusion that his whole salary arises from this disgraceful source.—United Service Journal for April.

TURKISH MARRIAGE.

I cannot better describe a marriage feast, than in the words of a friend of mine, who was present at one of some consequence in Constantinople. "I was invited by the haratshee-bushee, or capitation tax-gatherer, to attend the nuptials of his daughter. The feastings and rejoicings were to be conducted on a scale of unusual splendor, and to be continued three successive days. I found the extensive court-yard in front of the house, filled with a crowd of common people, in the midst of whom were squatted on the bare ground three Turkish musicians. One of them was exerting all the power of his lungs to force out of a squeaking hautboy certain goose-like notes, which were intended as a leading melody. His next neighbour was beating an accompaniment on an enormous drum, and the third had before him on the ground two very small kettle-drums, which he struck methodically with short sticks, as if to mark the time for the other two, and also serve as an accompaniment. Every part of the house was crowded with male visitors of all ranks, who made a very splendid display of rich clothes and costly ornaments. It was with the utmost difficulty that I succeeded in making my way to the upper end of the principal apartment, in one corner of which sat the bride on a velvet-covered sofa, nearly level with the floor. Her face, though without a veil, was completely concealed under a thick paste, the surface of which was painted in a variety of light colors. This kind of mask kept her eyes and mouth hermetically closed. As a friend of the house, I brought my present, consisting of a diamond ring, and a large gold coin called a mahmondiay. The former I placed on the bride's little finger, and the latter I endeavoured to fasten in front of her head-dress; but like many others which had preceded mine, it fell into her lap. The principal garment of the bride was an ample robe made of rich gold tissue. Her fingers were literally covered up to the nails with diamond rings. On her head-dress were heaps of diamond ornaments, some of which were her own, and others borrowed for the occasion. She wore round her neck some very rich pearl necklaces, joined with diamond clasps, and her long black hair hung in manifold tresses on her shoulders and back, intermingled with a profusion of gold tinsel. In this condition, exposed to the excessive heat of the weather, and of the crowded room, and having to endure all the torments of excessive thirst and hunger, was this poor creature to remain during two whole days, unattended by any one of her sex, excepting at night. At the close of the second day, the mask of paste was to be taken off; on the third she was to undergo the customary ceremonious purification at the vapour bath, and on the morning of the fourth the bridegroom was left at liberty to enter into his connubial rights. These ceremonies are always observed in Turkey on the occasion of a marriage, and only differ in point of splendor according to the condition and wealth of the parties."—Journal of a Nobleman.

DOUBLE OR QUITS—QUEEN'S THEATRE.

TO THE TATLER.

DEAR TATLER,—I looked in at the Queen's Theatre last night, and saw Mr BARNETT's pleasant little farce, Double or Quits (I believe adapted from the French). The plot is as follows:—

Miss Temple (Miss STOHWASSER) having received an intimation that Captain Somerton (Mr FORRESTER) to whom she is secretly married, will shortly be with her, shows the letter to Mrs Properly (Mrs GLOVER) who has pleasant old lady-like reminiscences of having dandled the Captain when a child on her knee. They are both in a state of blissful expectation, when "a gentleman" is announced. This is no other than Mr Augustus Podger (Mr WILKINSON) of Norton Falgate, who is immediately set down by the doting old lady for the Captain; Miss Temple making off with a most becoming propriety. Mr Podger sees that the old lady is labouring under a mistake, but is resolved to carry on the joke. She instals him as master of her house, and tells him that the lady has been hourly expecting him, and will be delighted to see him. A servant here announces, that the mail having broken down opposite the mansion, a lady and gentleman would be obliged if they could obtain accommodation for a short time. "Appeal to your master," says Mrs P. to the astonished footman. "Present my compliments to the lady and gentleman, and show them up," says the happy Podger. With infinite tact, he here sees that he may jump into a good thing; and making himself quite at home, immediately proceeds to a dressing-room "to put himself to rights," assuring Mrs P., who expresses uneasiness on the point, that his shirt is aired.

At this crisis, the Captain himself and Mrs Anna Maria Podger make their appearance, the former hoping for a considerable time that the lady has experienced no injury, and the latter assuring him, for an equal length of time, that owing to his kindness, she has not. Mr P., who is in the next room dressing, here calls aloud to Mrs Properly; and is thus recognized by his anxious spouse, who, in the most romantic style of Billy Taylor, is "kim for to seek her true love," who "ought to have been at home eight days ago." She goes to the door, and looks through the key-hole, to have ocular as well as oral demonstration of his identity; in the act of which she is surprised by the offended delicacy of Mrs Properly, Mr P. having completed his toilet, here comes out, and after his surprise has somewhat abated, resolves to get out of the scrape by turning the tables on his wife, whom he sees in close conversation with the gallant Captain. She pretends, however, not to know him; and Podger thus foiled in his attack, at last has recourse to entreaty, when they exit together to make it up. An interview then takes place between the Captain and Miss Temple; and after a few practical jokes, the mystery being solved to the coufused Mrs Properly, and a little fun between Podger and his dame, the piece concludes.

Mrs GLOVER enacted Mrs Properly very properly, except that her voice was rather too firm for a lady of seventy-six, and that she did not look above fifty. Her curtesy to Mr Podger, when she introduced herself, was the height of propriety. She appears, however, to err, as Mrs EDWIN does, in being hard, and uneasy when she is not speaking; though the want of animation in Miss STOHWASSER (who indeed never acts but when she is actually talking) may have in some degree been the cause of this, as she appeared to much greater advantage in the scene with WILKINSON.

Mr WILKINSON is always laughable. The way he has of smoothing the air with his hand, as if patronizing a succession of little boys, seems to have become a habit with him: it was by this action I recognised him, for though his name was whispered round about me, he seemed much fatter than the WILKINSON I had seen at the Adelphi. His imbecile anger at seeing the Captain toying with his wife was good It put me somewhat in mind of REEVE.

Miss STOHWASSER is a handsome girl, but, I should imagine, young in her profession. She is, as I have before said, totally motionless both as regards action and expression, unless she be herself talking. A sad tale may be told her, or a happy one, and she is entirely composed. This want of gusto gives her acting an appearance like patch-work; it is all in bits.

"NETTLEWIG HALL."

TO THE TATLER.

MR TATLER,—The new farce of Nettlewig Hall, produced on Thursday evening at Drury Lane, was produced three years ago at the Surrey Theatre: it was played two nights, and most heartily damned each night. I have at this moment in my possession the bill of the first night: the title of the piece on the Surrey bill is "Nettlewig Hall, or the Guardian Outwitted:" the names of the principal characters are the same, and the Drury Lane piece is line for line the same as the one produced at the Surrey Theatre. If you wish it, I will forward you the bill I allude to in a day or two.

I am, Sir, your constant reader,

Saturday, April 9, 1831. JUSTITIA.

P.S. By the bye, there has been a singular exposé with respect to the authorship of "The Ice Witch."

Miss FOOTE.—In contradiction to reports of a contrary description, we have the pleasure to state, on the authority of a correspondent on whose means of information we place reliance, "that that delightful actress and amiable woman, Miss Foote, became Countess of Harrington on Thursday last."

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 13, 1831.

MARRIAGE OF THE EARL OF HARRINGTON WITH MISS FOOTE.

We have been sorry to see, in a paper generally distinguished for its liberal sound sense, an ill-natured paragraph respecting this union. The question, at best, turns upon principles so little understood, so much modified by the manners of nations and even of classes, so gifted with privileges in behalf of the favoured and the legitimate, (or the legitimate illegitimate), and above all so beset with insincerities and hypocrisy, and so suggestive of delicacies towards the sex which most needs protection, that the noblest hearts will always put the most generous construction they can on the conduct of any woman, much more of one thrown into life under circumstances the most trying to youth, beauty, and good-heartedness. We always thought, as far as we knew anything of the matters in which she was concerned, (for we do not search into them with the industrious eyes of the censorious) that Miss Foote was more sinned against than sinning, and we desired no better evidence than her face to be convinced that she was good-hearted; for though it not seldom happens that faces are unjust to their owners, it is very rarely the case that a countenance can look ingenuous, and the extreme beauty of the eye seem to indicate a beautiful disposition, where the soul that looks through it, is of a different cast. Miss Foote has been a charming woman on the stage, and is most likely so in private life, for she has the reputation of being amiable. The Stanhopes are a family that have been accustomed to think for themselves, and we trust that the Noble Earl will be as happy as the lady seems calculated to make him. Miss Foote by her marriage will be sister-in-law to the Marchioness of Tavistock and the Duchess of Leinster.

We have never been among the number of those who wonder why lords should marry actresses. The reason is plain enough. The actresses have been charming women, who have shewn themselves superior to the common run of females; and they offer, in one respect, a peculiar temptation to love; namely, that the lover can raise the object of his passion in the eyes of the world.

We know not whether it was the Duke of Bolton, or the famous Earl of Peterborough, that first set the example of marrying in this line of life. Be this as it may, the first that ventured, was just of the rank and importance to cut the Gordian knot in this matter, and baffled objection.

The Duke of Beaufort married Lavinia Fenton, the famous Polly of the Beggar's Opera. She was the original performer of that character, and obtained a wonderful popularity. It is she of whom it is said, that the Duke once having an intention to quit her society, she fell on her knees, and sang "O, ponder well," in so touching a manner that he had not the heart to do it. He did not marry her till all the children that he had by her were born, so that the present family are not descended from this marriage. There are descendants, we believe, of the illegitimate children.

Lord Peterborough, the friend of Pope and Swift, and romantic conqueror in Spain, married Anastasia Robinson, a public singer, who resided with her mother in Golden square, where she gave concerts. The marriage was kept secret a long time, and only divulged a little before his death. They say that when he divulged it, which he did abruptly, though premeditatedly, to a circle of friends, the Countess fainted away. We have read somewhere that he made the disclosure in the room in St James's Palace immediately over the gate-way, leading into the court-yard, at the end of St James's street.

Lady Henrietta Herbert, daughter of the first Earl Waldegrave, and widow of a brother of the Marquis of Powis, married Beard, the famous singer, who was one of the best and most amiable of men, and respected by everybody. In the peerage books this marriage is omitted, as if there had been no such husband as Beard, though Herbert is carefully recorded, and his relationship to the Marquis. Yet so little has principle to do with this sort of pride, that in speaking of the Earl's father, due care is taken to mention that "his Lordship married Henrietta, natural daughter of James the Second, by Mrs Arabella Churchill, sister to John, Duke of Marlborough." Thus you may marry a natural daughter of a bad king, and be proud of it. But if your grand-child, named after that natural daughter, marries an honest man and a gentleman, who gets rich by an accomplishment, and is universally respected, it is a disgrace that must be anxiously concealed. However, this caution applies to former days rather than the present.

The Earl of Derby, who died the other day, married the celebrated Miss Farren, who was accounted on the stage a model of grace and gentility. The present Countess of Wilton is the daughter of this marriage. It is said (we know not with what truth) that the Earl never recovered his spirits after the loss of his wife.

The late Earl Craven married, in 1807, Miss Brunton of Covent Garden Theatre. She was one of those performers, who, like most that obtain fortunes of this nature, rather act well, because they are, in themselves, fine and pleasing women, than from any great professional talent. We remember her lounging about the stage, in the manner of Miss Chester, with an agreeable and unaffected consciousness of her beauty, playing with a flower.

The late Lord Thurlow, who in his eccentric productions evinced a more genuine talent for poetry than is commonly supposed, took to wife, in 1813, Miss Bolton, a pleasing actress, by whom he had the present lord, and two other sons.

The present Duke of St Albans, in 1827, married Mrs Coutts, formerly Miss Mellon; thus restoring to the profession the honours of which it had been the medium in his family: the first Duke, his Grace's ancestor, being the son of Charles the Second, by Nell Gwynn.

Lord William Lennox, brother to the Duke of Richmond, another descendant of Charles the Second, married Miss Paton, now Mrs Wood. To these unions, as indicative of the general rise which the profession has taken in what is called respectability, may be added that of Miss O'Neill to a Member of Parliament; of Miss Serle to the Rev. Mr Heathcote, brother to Sir Gilbert; and Lucretia Bradshaw to the celebrated Martin Folkes, the scholar and antiquary, who was one of the earliest to set this liberal example.

[Final Extract.]

PRESENTATION OF THE BRITISH AMBASSADOR TO THE REIGNING SULTAN.

[From an article in Major Keppel's Appendix, written by the Right Hon. Robert Grosvenor, M.P.]

'On Monday the 13th of July, our ambassador's audience with the Grand Signior took place at the camp at Buyukdéré. Three tents were pitched for the ceremony. The first in front for the Sultan, the other two a little in the rear on either side; one of these was for the caimacan and ministers, the other for the ambassador and suite. Behind were encamped a regiment of cavalry, a company of light artillery, four regiments of infantry, and several companies of artillery. These were dotted about in different places amongst the trees and coppice which adorn the varied ground between the Sultan's house and the place of our reception.

'The Blonde and Rifleman had sailed up the Bosphorus a few days before, and had been moored astern of the line of the Turkish fleet just opposite.

'At nine o'clock our own and the Turkish ships were dressed out in flags.

'The shore was lined with troops, and crowded with people thronging to see the novel sight. The Bosphorus was covered with caiques.

'At ten o'clock the ambassador, the Right Hon. Sir Robert Gordon, embarked in the state caique, accompanied by Mr Parish, bearing the King's letter credential, M. Chabert, the principal dragoman, and Captain Lyons's two little sons, standard-bearers of the union jack, each holding a small silk flag. The marines were already landed; the whole party came ashore in the ship's boats. The procession then formed in the following order:—Twenty-four servants in state liveries; the interpreters; the marines in three ranks; the ambassador on horseback; three cavasses on each side; the attachés and "illustrious travellers;" the officers of our two ships: the rear was brought up by another party of marines. In this order we marched between two lines of Turkish troops to the tent of the caimacan. On a long ottoman sat the caimacan, the seraskier pasha, the cadi les mers (chancellors of Europe and Asia) the defterdar, and two or three others. They rose upon the entrance of the ambassador, and he was allowed to take his seat upon the divan on the right of the caimacan, an honour that former ambassadors were not granted.

'We remained standing at a little distance, and M. Chabert knelt before the ambassador and caimacan to interpret. A few compliments passed between them. The attendants now brought five things like casks, upon which silver trays were placed; each of these was furnished with a cloth and a few tortoise-shell spoons; chairs were placed, and dinner was served. The caimacan and ambassador, with M. Chabert as interpreter, occupied the first table. The seraskier, Lord Yarmouth, Captain Lyons, Mr Parish, and Mr Wood, interpreter, the second. The two cadi les mers the third. The defterdar, Lord Dunlo, Captain Mitchell, Mr Mellish, and myself, with M. Pisani, interpreter, the fourth. Mr Edward Villiers, Colonel Vernon, and the rest of the party, the fifth.

'The dinner was a most curious composition: the dishes, to the number of twenty-five, were placed separately on the table, and each of them was tasted, the fluids with the spoon, the solids with the fingers. The dishes were served in violation of all our rules of eating; soup after entrées, fish after jelly, the rôti, preceded by ice, the pièce de résistance by an omelette aux confitures. The Turks are very fond of sugar in almost all their ragoûts: the most curious dish of all was a transparent jelly placed on a glass dish containing water and little fishes, so that it conveyed the idea of fishes swimming in a lemon jelly.

'When the last dish was removed, the attendants brought round a basin and some rose-water, with which we washed our hands, and tables and train disappeared in a twinkling.

'From the caimacan's we went to a small tent to robe. A cloak with a diamond clasp was placed on the shoulders of the ambassador; yellow ones, with diamond clasps, were given the attachés and principal dragomans; pink and brown ones to the rest of the party.

'The cannon from a small battery near the Sultan's house announced that his Sublime Highness had embarked; and the roar of the salutes from the whole Turkish fleet, which enveloped the camp with a dusky cloud, proclaimed his approach to the place of debarkation.

'The captain of one of the Turkish corvettes had not withdrawn the cartridges with which his guns had been charged, and saluted his lord and master with ball: one struck the water, near the spot over which the Sultan passed a few minutes after; a second skimmed along the water in the midst of caiques full of parties of pleasure; a third went in the fort, but, almost by a miracle, no one was killed. The Sultan ordered the captain to be immediately put in irons.

'Three of the Blonde's boats formed part of the Grand Signior's cortège for the last quarter of a mile, and gave him nine cheers. The Sultan came in a boat something like the large Indian canoe, high fore and aft, rowed by fourteen men, two upon each bench: the craft is black outside, and has no other ornament than two small gilt eagles, one perched upon the top of the rudder, the other upon a small gilt staff near the prow.

'The boatmen wore a small red cap just covering the sacred lock on the top of the head; the shirt had no collar, but immense gigot sleeves made of a sort of elastic gauze of the finest texture; a red silk sash, and white muslin trousers of most capacious dimensions, confined at the knee by a string; the feet were bare. The simplicity of the boat and the boatmen's dresses contrasted forcibly, and gave a wonderful relief to the figure of the Sultan himself, reclining upon silks and cashmeres, blazing with the most magnificent brilliants. His Highness was accompanied by Mustapha, the favourite and Secretary; Achmet Bey, his Colonel of Hussars; and one or two others, in their gala apparel.

'A salute of twenty-one guns was fired the moment the Sultan landed. He now mounted a beautiful Arabian; the housings, bridle, bit, frontlet, breast-plate, and crupper, were covered with diamonds. The animal was painted a great variety of colours; two of his legs were white, the others streaked, his chest was spotted, as was also his nose; but he was beautiful, and the effect was decidedly good. The roar of cannon, and the clang of martial music, had excited all his warlike feelings; he pawed the ground, snorted, and threw the foam from his bit, and chafed as if he would dash from the hands that held him: but the moment the Sultan was on his back he became tranquil, and bore his courtly honours as proudly as the favourite Mustapha, who marched by his side.

'The Sultan was attended by his band of gentlemen pensioners: they were dressed in jacket and trousers of red cloth, with a good deal of gold embroidery: each of these carried a silver battle-axe.

'As the Sultan approached, there was a simultaneous cry of "Long live the invincible Mahmoud!"

'On dismounting, the Sultan went to his tent, where he robed himself for the ceremony. He here found the present from our King, worth about two thousand pounds, consisting of a magnificent aigrette. He was anxious to wear it on the occasion, but he broke the clasp in trying to pût it on.

'After some time spent in adorning his imperial person, he came to the grand tent and mounted his throne, which was an enormous mass of solid silver, with arms and back something like a raised sofa; upon it was a cushion so completely covered with pearls, that it was not till, by a subsequent inspection, I discovered its material to be red velvet.

'The acclamations were again repeated; and ten imaums, who stood in front of the tent, prostrated themselves before the successor of Mahomet. The caimacan, seraskier, and reis effendi, were then granted an audience. After that, we were desired to advance, and had the honour of being the first embassy that had been allowed to approach the imperial presence with swords on.

'Some Turkish officers entered with us; this is the remnant of an ancient, barbarous usuage, to prevent the ambassador or suite from attempting anything against the sacred person. Formerly it was customary to hold the arms of the party; but this part of the ceremony was dispensed with.

'The body-guard were drawn up on each side of the throne; they looked like so many statues, perfectly erect, not moving a muscle, their faces averted from the Sultan, who sat glittering upon his gorgeous throne.

'On his right hand stood the caimacan, on his left Mustapha the favourite, and another. The Sultan wore on his head a fez cap, surrounded by a train of diamonds, with an aigrette in the centre, surmounted by a most beautiful esprit feather. A large cashmere violet cloak enveloped nearly the rest of his person, except where it was opened to display a magnificent star of brilliants: one could also perceive that he wore an ample pair of Cossack trousers, Wellington boots, and heeled spurs. The present Sir Robert Gordon had brought him, lay in an open case by his side.

'The Sultan is about forty-five years of age. He has a handsome black beard, trimmed rather short, according to the fashion of the day, arched eyebrows, very fine eyes, and a full round face; his profile is very distinguished and handsome. He rides remarkably well, and it is on horseback that he looks best, as his greatest deficiency in figure, which is want of leg, is thereby concealed: his chest is very broad, and his whole bust gives a promise of great strength. He prides himself upon being able to shoot an arrow farther than any of his subjects. It is to be presumed that he has not many competitors.

'As we entered, he rather inclined forward, resting one hand on the cushion of his throne, thereby displaying a part of his person of which he is exceedingly proud, with sundry rings of untold value decorating the fingers thereof.

'When the ambassador arrived within eight or nine paces of his imperial presence, he stopped. The Sultan then beckoned to him very graciously, and he approached about half the distance of separation. Sir Robert now made his speech, which was translated by the principal dragoman of the Porte.

'The caimacan not repeating it fast enough, or to the satisfaction of the Sultan, it was taken up by his Highness, who finished the sentence himself. This is esteemed a very great compliment, as usually the Sultan is not supposed to vouchsafe even a look towards a Giaour.

'Without appearing to do so, he took a comprehensive view of us all: not seeing Captain Lyons, he inquired for him. Observing M. Chabert, who is an oldish man, and whom he knew very well by sight, he said, "I perceive Chabert dyes his mustaches; but he must put on a greater quantity before he can make himself look young again."

'When the Sultan had finished his speech, we withdrew, and he retired to a small tent immediately behind the large one, whence, after taking off his heavier ornaments, he mounted his horse, and returned to his boat, in the same state as he came.'

— One of the most celebrated Russian Generals now in Poland, it is said, was formerly a dentist; he now commands at Pul-tusk.—Herald.

— The Poles, in general, are much smaller men than the Russians, but equally well dressed. The lancers attract particular attention; the ease with which they manage the lance, and their graceful seat on horseback, have never been equalled by the lancers of any European power; they are mounted on excellent active horses from White Russia. The chasseurs à cheval have a very neat and plain uniform; the carbines are slung in their belts.—Daily Paper.

Horticultural Society.—At a meeting of this Society, notice was given, that medals would be awarded for the best exhibition of roses, camellias, dahlias, melons, pines, grapes, azaleas, and rhododendrons upon certain stated days throughout the year, provided any articles sufficiently worthy of a medal should be exhibited; and also that a large silver medal should be given for the most ornamental hardy plant, and a Banksian medal for the second best that might be exhibited before May 1, 1832. It was also announced that, in consequence of suggestions which had been offered to the council, the annual fête and exhibition of fruit would take place at the Garden on the 22d of June, instead of the 18th.

P. S.—Shortly after Sir Philip Stevens quitted the office of Secretary to the Admiralty (so long and so pertinaciously held by Mr Croker, till happily ejected in the late change of Ministry) one of the clerks having occasion to present a letter to his successor, Sir Evan Nepean, the latter observed that the letter terminated with a postscript commencing with the letters E. N.; and on asking the clerk the meaning of these mysterious initials, was answered, that in the time of his predecessor, Sir Philip Stevens, they were in the habit of putting P. S. but now, of course, E. N. was substituted

"THE FRENCH SPY"—QUEEN'S THEATRE.

TO THE TATLER.

DEAR MR TATLER,—Englishmen have had it forcibly impressed upon them of late, that they are not the only great nation in the world, and The French Spy is one of the thousand results of their conviction. It is a melo-drama of no very common order, containing various compliments to our illustrious neighbours, on their bravery and patriotism. The following is a sketch of the plot:—

Mathilde de Grammont is a dumb-lady, who follows her lover Major Lafont (Mr SPENCER), to the Siege of Algiers. She devotes her life to protect him. Lafont is taken prisoner, and she, disguising herself as an Houah, or inspired Arab boy, enters the Algerine camp, to attempt his release. While in the act of planning the escape, Ben Mouza (Mr KEPPELL), whom she has previously wounded when he was prisoner of the Christians, enters the yard beneath the prison window. He recognizes Mathilde as the boy that wounded him in the Christian camp; she also recognizes him, and they engage. During the combat, and when Ben Mouza is considerably weakened, the Algerine guards come in and take her prisoner. They are about to kill her, when Serjeant Beauvine (Mr MARSHALL)—who is in the secret of her sex,—upbraids them with their cowardice in killing a woman. The Dey, when he hears this, orders her to be dressed in the garb of her sex, and installed as one of the Ladies of the Harem. She rejects his advances with scorn; and her lover declares, that rather than betray the intentions of the Christians, they will suffer death. They have taken leave, and Lafont places his head on the block, when the Christians burst open the doors, and after a desperate struggle, the Algerines surrender. We have given this summary of the plot that the reader may form a better idea of the beautiful acting of the heroine.

Mademoiselle CELESTE is rather tall than otherwise, but exquisitely made, and very graceful. Her countenance is intellectual if not handsome, and she has eyes sparkling with good-nature. When she experiences any pleasurable feeling, her whole soul seems in her face, and she makes you as happy as herself;—when she would express scorn, (as she does at the proposals of the Dey), her countenance, so susceptible of passion, is dignified and determined; and during sadness, she equally impresses you with a sentiment of pity and tenderness.

Perhaps the best passage in her performance was where she takes leave of her lover, to go to the Algerine camp. Words could not have expressed her sorrow, or better told the hope she had that they might meet again. Her conversation with him at the prison window, and her description of the movements of the Christians, whom she pretended to see afar off, were hardly less beautiful. Mademoiselle may have defects,—great ones; but her beauties so greatly outshine them, that I am at a loss to know what they consist in. She certainly cannot disguise her sex,—the lady is always apparent. Whether she be judged by the feelings of fifty or twenty, she is charming, though the impression made in the latter case may be of a livelier nature.

Miss STOHWASSER acts better in this piece than in Double or Quits; she is more at her ease. Miss S. is a very pretty dancer.

Mr WILKINSON, as Colin Coquinard, a sort of excrescence on the plot, was admirable. His asking the guards, "What will my poor mother say? Cut off in the prime of life! Nipt i'the bud?"—and his telling them, when going at the point of the bayonet to prison, that "He'd rather be killed in France, if you please," were beautifully ludicrous. Mr MARSHALL played the Serjeant, and acted up to WILKINSON, which is "certainly saying a great deal."

Mr SPENCER looked the Major well. He's a good-looking fellow, only he is too much aware of it. A very just and liberal clap-trap (if we may use such a phrase) was put into his mouth:—"He's a Frenchman," said he—"no bad appellation now-a-days."

Mr KEPPELL's malicious laugh, when he had been baffled in his attempt to stab the General, was the best thing he did. Does this gentleman pique himself on his ocular intensity? JUVENIS.

Overture, Semiramide	Rossini.

Leader, Mr SPAGNOLETTI.—Conductor, Mr ATTWOOD.

BEETHOVEN'S symphony, independently of its general masterly treatment, and delightful melodies, is a universal favourite, on account of the poetical manner in which the composer has treated his rural scenery, and out-of-door customs and effects. The description of the clear and vigorous youth of the summer morning, interspersed with charming subjects and modulations; with remote hints now and then of the "song of earliest birds," and the two "flutty notes" of the "plain-song Cuckoo gray;" the rustic dance; the gradual gathering, and the final out-pouring of the thunder-storm—a most vivid piece of musical painting, as fine in its way as one of GASPAR POUSSIN'S land-storms; the clearing off, and the calm, placid, beaming of the sunshine, triumphing like gentleness over turbulence;—are all calculated to attract the uncultivated as well as the refined musical understanding. Upon the present occasion it was admirably performed. The duet from the "Guillaume Tell," one of the most musician-like scenes ROSSINI ever composed, both for character, melody, and instrumentation, was but indifferently sung by Messrs SAPIO and PHILLIPS. Both were defective in energy, and the orchestra frequently overpowered them. The audience marked their disapprobation of the general performance. Mr SCHULZ is a fine performer on the pianoforte, so far as regards distinct as well as rapid execution. He gives every note on the instrument with a perfectly level accuracy; but—(and this exception must be considered as applying to a single hearing, and without our having a sufficiently favourable opportunity to decide) we should fear he will be found wanting in delicate and pathetic expression. We repeat—that we had not full means of judging upon the present occasion; for the concerto he selected contains little more than a succession of excessively difficult passages, written expressly for the purpose of showing the manual dexterity of the player. Now, we have no higher admiration for mere difficulty, than for an opera-dancer who can stand for five minutes with her toe at right angles with her eye, and at the same time is deficient in exhibiting the graceful undulations that attend a tender appeal to our sympathies, whether of love or pity. We would speak with forbearance of Miss CRAMER; yet a jealousy in behalf of the best interests of these fine concerts, compels us to say, that she has been introduced there too early. The assisting in private performances, however exalted they may be as regards station in society, are not warrant sufficient for her being worthy to take part in those of the Philharmonic Society. We may feel assured that, with other connections, and with the moderate accomplishments she now possesses, she would on no account have been introduced there. Romberg's overture is a masterly composition, and concludes with a finely-wrought fugue upon an energetic subject. We have no other remark to offer respecting Mozart's Symphony in G minor, than that it is matter of regret to think the immortal musician should never have heard it performed in the style it was upon the present occasion. Madame STOCKHAUSEN sang the recitative and air from the 'Creation' with admirable expression, neat and finished execution, and with exquisite purity and correctness of tone. She is a singer who never fails to please; both because she is sure to accomplish what she undertakes, and because of the strict justness of her intonation. It was great pleasure to listen to the combined excellence of her performance of this lovely air, with that of the effects of the accompaniments, particularly the wind instruments. The trio from CORELLI was most rapturously received; and so it should have been. The rich and large tones from those three noble instruments in the opening adagio will never pass from our recollection. It was one of those overwhelming appeals to the senses which leave the patient at a disadvantage in endeavouring to communicate his ideas and feelings. Of the quartett by CHERUBINI we feel incompetent to pronounce an opinion, for it did not go well, and we were uneasy at the performance. The last movement, however, seemed to be worthy of the great German-Italian.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

A LOVE MESSAGE.

"Little bird! Lonely bird!
Wherefore come to me?
Why hast thou left thy warm nest
In the pine tree?
Is it joy that thou dost bring?
Is it sorrow thou dost sing
Unto me?

Is it hope that thou dost borrow
From the ever-bright to-morrow,— Chaining thus for me
A spirit that doth ever flee
From other men? Ah! if 't be so,
Sing again, sweet and low,
Cease not thou thy pretty song;
Sweetest airs are never long.

But hast thou not, thou wanderer bird,
Brought from Love a little word,
Sent by Blanche to me,—
When her thoughts were in their spring,
Sweet, and soft, and free,
As unfettered love should be?"

"— But one little word have I,
(Uttered 'tween a smile and sigh)
Brought unto thee here,—
Something between joy and fear,
Something between hope and doubt, !
Such as Love ne'er lives without;
Sunshine with a little shade,
Such as may become a maid."

Thus quoth she—
'Whisper in the twilight air,
Lover young, beware, beware,
Of Inconstancy!
Bid him not forget there's one
Who's with him aye at set of sun!
Tell him there may be—there are—
Others thrice as good and fair,
But not one
Who can love as I have done.'"

DOMESTIC INSTRUCTION.

A GENTLEWOMAN whose residence adjoins Kensington Gardens, and who has brought up and educated a large family, being at present découvrè from her sons having gone out into the world, wishes to RECEIVE into her domestic circle, now consisting only of herself and daughter, TWO LITTLE BOYS, from five to ten years of age, whom she would instruct in the Latin Accidence, and such rudiments as are fitted to prepare them for large or public schools. This arrangement is particularly desirable for little boys whose delicacy of constitution may unfit them for encountering the habits and discipline of a school. The advertiser has been accustomed to pay great attention to the health of her own children, and the same care would be extended to those confided to her charge.—Address A. B. A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

THURSDAY, APRIL 14, 1831.

THE PUBLIC PRESS.

THE following passage appeared in the Spectator of Sunday last:—

'"Journalism" is nothing but the expression of public opinion. A newspaper that should attempt to dictate, must soon perish. Every now and then, indeed, a journal is started for the enforcement of some opinion not accepted out of the narrow circle which establishes the paper. But the speculation invariably fails, both in a political and in a pecuniary sense. Dictation is hateful to all the world; and a newspaper cannot dictate, because, if it dictates, it dies. True, many a newspaper appears to dictate,—as, for instance, the Times, in its late "thundering" articles against the poor Boroughmongers; but to call this dictation, would be like saying that it is the hatchet, and not the woodsman, who fells the tree. Newspapers are but an instrument to express the opinions of their readers on either side of whatever may be the question; and, taken altogether, where the Press is free, they constitute the public voice.'

There is a good deal of truth in these remarks; but it is not the whole truth. If journals had never been in advance of public opinion, public opinion would not have been so advanced as it is. We grant that, for the most part, and with more or less credit to the sincerity of their conductors, journals express nothing but the sentiments of their readers. One editor shall think just as his readers do; that is to say, he shall have been one of a class, who have such and such a set of opinions, and he shall say, "I will set up a paper, and do my best to enforce these opinions." Whatever the opinions of such an editor may be, he is an honest man, provided they have not originated in a motive indifferent to the common good. Another editor shall say, "I will set up a paper in furtherance of such and such opinions, but I must not express them all, because it would injure their ultimate success." This too is an honest man, provided he thinks what he says, and takes care never to say what he does not think; for the moment a man plays fast and loose with a principle, he has no claim to our belief in saying that he does it from a good motive. His self-deception (supposing him to have succeeded in producing it) becomes naturally attributed to self-interest. A third shall advocate a reigning set of opinions through thick and thin, with every species of partiality towards its supporters, and injustice towards those who oppose it. This man is a rascal. A fourth shall uphold an unfavoured cause, in the same spirit. This editor may be concluded honest as to money, but not as to passion and self-indulgence. There is a bad part in his disposition, which he indulges in the spirit of an outlaw. Other editors, of various parties, shall look chiefly or entirely to the pecuniary profit, regarding the principles they advocate as an accident of education or intercourse, and perhaps regretting that they have not moved in a more profitable circle. These are mere tradesmen, and to be tolerated or disliked, personally, according to their private qualities. Finally, a man here and there, shall write in the spirit of a martyr, or of one whose conscience lives within the bond of an oath, speaking what appears to him to be "the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth." We should say that such a writer was bound to be either a man of exalted genius, or of spotless life, or of consummate prudence in every other respect but this one; otherwise he stands a chance of injuring his cause for a time, and is almost certain to ruin himself. And in no man have we a greater right to demand that he should be of a good disposition, and not likely to confound an overweening self-love and impatient will with the necessary good of mankind. If his disposition be what it ought to be, we need not say what reverence such a man deserves. At all events, without martyrs of some sort, society has hitherto been unable to advance; not as that reverend and facetious gentleman, Mr Sidney Smith, seems to think, because mankind "object to every species of gratuitous happiness, and consider every advantage as too cheap which is not purchased by some calamity" (which is an observation tending to give us such an impression of human folly, as to assist in perpetuating it), but because, as the great poet has told us,' men are not easily disposed to fly from known evils, however great, to the chance of unknown, which may be greater; and furthermore, because it is not to the ultimate advantage of the world, that this globe should be blown about by "every wind of doctrine." It is not undesirable, however impatient it may sometimes make reformers, that mankind should be slow to change. It only shews how necessary the change must be when the propriety of it is admitted, and how fast they may adhere to a new and better system.

If a man who is not of the exalted genius above-mentioned, or of the requisite perfection of life, chooses to make a martyr of himself, out of some honourable and energetic principle, which he mingles with his infirmities, we shall not be able to withhold a certain portion of our esteem from him, perhaps of our admiration; but he must be content to suffer all the drawbacks upon his fame, which his infirmities deserve, and to have it doubted, whether his advocacy of the principle does not, in its very strength, partake of the weakness of the rest of his will. But unquestionably such a man may sow the seed of a great deal of ultimate good, and cannot be considered dishonest or worldly.

We confess, for our parts, that lovers as we are of truth, and incapable as we believe ourselves to be of deliberately compromising it, however our prejudices may dim our perceptions, we respect the line that is drawn between sincerity and wholesale speaking, and do not consider the abrupt utterance of the whole truth to be essentially necessary, either to the reputation for honesty, or to the well-being of the world. We may, however, be wrong on that point; but we are sure we cannot be wrong when we demand that a writer shall be sincere, and speak nothing which he does not hold to be true. Whatever trespasses upon that principle is justly to be laid to the account of a selfish and mercenary spirit, and is only pardonable in proportion to the folly of the individual. But upon this we have touched already. We believe, however, that a writer, anxious for the public good, and advanced by his studies beyond the common run of opinion, will do everything he can, consistent with a due regard to the feelings of the community, and the prosperity of that good, to bring society up to him; and therefore will insinuate to them all the attractions in his power, equally consistent with his regard for veracity. This we hold to be the full duty of a journalist; and taking the provincial press into account, we believe there are many journalists who perform it, even in this country, to say nothing of our gallant and patriotic neighbours in France. A Saintly Borough-monger has talked of "that profligate thing the public press." The press despised, as they had a right to do, the profligate thing that said it,—the more profligate, on account of his saintliness. What has a saint to do with a sinecure? or what profligacy can surpass his, who will pocket thousands for doing nothing, while the producers of the thousands are starving! The poor famished wretches in England and Ireland should make out a bill, and send it in to this man.

There are doubtless profligate men to be found among the proprietors of journals. Who is to wonder at it, when the press can be made a vehicle of trade, and sheer money getting? And yet such is the unavoidable humanity of the medium through which these men speculate, that we will venture to say there are none of them so profligate as he who charged the whole press with their delinquencies. They cannot be; for their situation is at all events no sinecure. The most mercenary proprietor of a periodical work has his business to go through, has his cares and anxieties, his accounts to keep and his writers to look after, his prosecutions to avoid or to compromise, his enemies to conciliate or oppose, his rivals to keep up with. What has the sinecure saint to do all this while, but to cant and to pray, and to thank God that he is not like "this publican?" The most profligate of all journalists, is he who makes a trade of scandal; and yet though he may cant in behalf of church and state, there is generally an air in his cant which lets out the secret of his disbelief; and though the harm he does is great and horrible, he is, perhaps, not only of that reckless disposition which loses sight of half the evil it inflicts, but he too encounters care and anxiety, fine, obloquies, and imprisonments, and a retributive chance of blows. From all these, except the obloquies, the snug and "respectable" saint keeps free; and when the obloquy comes, he has so played the hypocrite with himself, as to thank God for it. You may always know a saint of a certain order, high or low, by his thanking God for the worst things about him. Orator Henley was an impudent dog, yet he sometimes met with people more impudent. It is said that he once encountered a man in conversation, who talked with such a triumphant ignorance, that Henley told him, he seemed to pique himself upon it. "Well, Sir;" said the man, "suppose I do, and what then?"—"Nay, you may thank God for it, for what I care," says Henley. "Well, Sir," returns the man, "suppose I do thank God for it, what then?"—"Why, then," concluded the orator, "you've a great deal to thank God for." Upon this inverted principle of the desirable, the gratitude of a saint ought to be boundless.

We have rambled somewhat from our intention in these remarks. What we meant to say was, that although the Press, for the most part, does not "dictate" to the public, yet the whole of it may be said, more or less, to insinuate a kind of dictation; that is to say, it at once accompanies and leads the opinion of the public. It must do so, by the very fact of its discussion of principles, which naturally lead the community into new trains of thought. Secondly, we have to observe, that there are some periodical works which are professedly in advance of public opinion, and yet have not failed of success. It is true, their success may not be of the highest mercenary kind; but the writers obtain honour and gratitude, and have means withal of entertaining their thoughts, which the mere money-getter despairs of. The Westminster Review is in advance of the public, yet it succeeds. The Chronicle, of late years, has been in advance of its old Whig readers, and perhaps it has lost some of them; yet it lives and flourishes. Yes; it may be said, because the public is with it. True; but it has helped to bring the public into that position: opinion must manifest itself somewhere: there must be leaders, as well as the led. The growth of public opinion implies the fostering of it. The Examiner has always advocated the cause of reform. For many years it advocated it to a comparatively small circle. So did some of the country papers. But are we to suppose that this circle was not enlarged by the advocacy? and that the Editors of those papers have not a right to be proud of having assisted to lead as well as to accompany opinion? The wit and talents of the present Editor of the Examiner have most likely enlarged the sale of that paper. Do we think he has not enlarged the opinions of its new purchasers, or that he could have enlarged them, if he merely had acquiesced in the opinions they held already?

The English Press has its defects,—some portion of it very deplorable ones, particularly that of the old Tory school; "which it is pretty to observe." We need not add that we allude to the lying, scandalizing, and bullying part of the Press. But upon the whole, the periodical literature of this country, particularly the newspaper portion of it, and always including the Provincial Press, is an honour to the spirit as well as the prudence of all connected with it.

AMERICAN DRAWING-ROOMS.

The following description of a Drawing-room at the American Court, will probably afford some amusement, from the marked contrast it affords to everything we are here accustomed to think fashionable:—

WASHINGTON, JAN. 5.—There have been, since my arrival here, three levees, or drawing-rooms, held at the President's house, all of which I attended; and I know not how I can better fill my letter than by giving you a description of what I saw, &c.

On entering the house, you find yourself in a very large room, which I believe is called the hall, the floor of which is covered with smooth oil cloth. The appearance of the room is somewhat naked, as there is but little furniture in it. On the opposite side from the entrance there are three doors, which open into rooms in which the company is received. The door to the right opens into a lofty square room, furnished with elegant cushioned chairs, sofas, and settees—it is hung with splendid crimson curtains, corresponding with the dress of the furniture—the chimney ornaments are of the most beautiful workmanship, and the mantel-piece, and the work about the fire-place, all of which is of the finest marble, may be ranked with the best specimens of sculpture. In this room, also, there is a full-length likeness of Washington, a very large mirror, a superb glass chandelier, a circular table of handsome marble, and a variety of rich furniture, which I cannot think of putting into one letter. If you go from the large ante-room or hall, to the left door, you enter a square room of about the same dimensions as the one described. The hangings of this room are blue, and the dress of the furniture corresponds. Here, too, there is a superb glass chandelier, a large mirror, and a variety of elegant decorations. I approached a piano which stood against the wall, and found upon it a number of books, containing a choice collection of Italian music. It occurred to me that there should have been, in company with these foreigners, at least one book of American songs, marches, and airs. The centre door from the hall opens into a beautiful saloon, which is illuminated with a very costly glass chandelier. It is furnished with two large mirrors, elegant cushioned chairs, sofas, and settees, placed round the wall. The hangings are crimson, supported in a magnificent manner. Here it is that the President and his lady take their stand to receive company.

On entering the hall, your first business is to select a place in which to deposit your hat, &c. You then follow the friend whom you have selected to introduce you to the high personages of the mansion, and are immediately ushered into the saloon, where, if you have arrived late, you will probably find a most uncomfortable crowd, all standing, with the exception, perhaps, of a few invalids. In a moment all sort of diffidence which you may have felt, being a stranger—all fear and trembling—vanishes; and, in the place of ceremony and etiquette,—instead of being stared at because you are a backwoodsman,—you find yourself a component part of one of the most unceremonious, careless, talking, laughing, democratic assemblages that can be found anywhere. Indeed, a stranger to you will scarcely ask your pardon, even were he to step on your sorest corn; and so far from being gazed at too much, you feel half angry on account of the little notice that is taken of you: yet you can easily console yourself; for, on looking about, you see scores of individuals not a whit more important than yourself, and as much alone.

Having followed your friend into the saloon, you have only to keep in his wake until he has, like a vessel among masses of moving ice, edged and crowded his way into the vicinity of the President and his lady, where you stand until an opportunity offers of being introduced. When this arrives your friend names you—the President takes you by the hand, which he gives what may be called a very slight "pump handle" shake, at the same time asking, "How do you do, Sir?" or something to that amount.—You are then named to Mrs A.* who receives you with a graceful curtsey, while you bow as well as you have been taught. You are now at liberty to look around, and soon discover all that is to be seen. The dress of the ladies who attend the Drawing-rooms, resembles very much that worn by the ladies of the Northern States at parties, assemblies, &c. There are, however, about their heads, more ornaments, such as feathers, or ringlets, rich combs, bands, &c. than the ladies of the north are in the habit of wearing; and the dress is cut so as to expose more of the shoulders and back than I have been accustomed to seeing in our part of the country. But there did not appear to be anything like extravagance in the dresses of the ladies—indeed, many had a remarkably neat and economical appearance; and they were no doubt adopted either to set off to advantage the pretty forms and faces of the wearers, or because they were not liable to receive damage in a squeeze. I need not mention the dress of the gentlemen, who are only required (by what authority I know not) to appear in a dress-coat; and it is at their option to wear smallclothes, silk-stockings and pumps, or pantaloons and boots. Those of the navy and army, with some of the foreign ministers, appear in military costume—the latter wearing decorations of certain orders to which they belong. You must not expect me to give you a description of the beauty that is to be seen at a Drawing-room. I can only say that there is a great deal to be found there—yet it is impossible to particularize—it is impossible to single out a nymph from among the crowd that attends, and pronounce her the most graceful or the most beautiful—for, to use the expression of an honest young Irishman, "they eclipse each other" in such a manner that you are bewildered in the attempt at selection—and for this reason I think no young man will ever be in danger of losing his heart at a Presidential Levee.

There is no such thing as a game at cards to be seen—seldom any music—no dancing—all is buzz, quiz, squeeze, laugh, and jostle, yet all behave well—everything goes on in an orderly manner, and you cannot feel angry at any one, for no one misbehaves. The novelty of the scene having passed off, you ascertain that your legs are aching, and seat yourself on an elegant chair or sofa, when it occurs to you to look at the President and his lady, to see what they are doing. In a short time you get a glimpse of them—they are standing in about the same place that you found them in at your introduction—the former with a countenance expressive of much patience and resignation, yet with some symptoms of fatigue, and a sort of I-wish-it-was-over look. His lady, though apparently not in good health, seems to be equally resigned, and equally determined to do the duties of a kind and hospitable hostess. How long they keep their feet I know not; but I have formed the opinion that the duties of the Drawing-room are by far the most tedious and laborious among all those that our Presidents are, by their stations, called on to perform.

During the stay of the company, refreshments are carried about by black servants—they consist of tea, coffee, bread and butter, various cakes, creams, &c. with wine and other drinks. But it requires some experience in a visitor to obtain a taste of anything; for the servants, who bear the refreshments, pass through the crowd with such velocity, that unless you are well practised in the art of shooting on the wing, you will return home dry and hungry.

To the several European ministers, and the gentlemen composing their suites, the scene presented at a Drawing-room must be truly novel, and, I should hope, instructive. They can there witness a practical illustration of the spirit of freedom which pervades our institutions, and predominates in the American character —there they behold the head elect of our mighty nation, standing uncovered, in the plain garb of a Republican magistrate, and on the same floor with the humble citizen who made his coat—there they see our legislators, the heroes of our navy and army, the learned in the law, and the props of religion, all giving the friendly grasp to the hard hand of the agriculturalist and the mechanic—and there, too, they learn that pure republican freedom is not incompatible with the virtue, the strength or the durability of a vast empire. How different this scene from the levees of the despotic rulers which they have so often witnessed in their own countries!—American Paper.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

SHELLEY.

Holy and mighty Poet of the Spirit
That broods and breathes along the universe!
In the least portion of whose starry verse
Is the great breath the sphered heavens inherit—
No human song is eloquent as thine;
For, by a reasoning instinct all divine,
Thou feel'st the soul of things; and thereof singing,
With all the madness of a skylark, springing
From earth to heaven, the intenseness of thy strain,
Like the lark's music all around us ringing,
Laps us in God's own heart, and we regain
Our primal life etherial! Men profane
Blaspheme thee: I have heard thee Dreamer styled—
I've mused upon this wakefulness—and smiled.

[We have been much gratified with the communications of this poetical correspondent; and shall be glad to hear from him as often as his Muse is inclined.]

— While General Skzrynecki is harassing the Russians on the side of Warsaw, General Dwernicki leaves them no rest at Lublin; at this rate, the Russians stand fair to be beaten from Pole to Pole.

— We have somewhere seen it remarked, that Marshal Diebitsch's name, when translated into plain English, means nothing more nor less than Thievish. Why do not our translators translate the German names as well as news? How well it would read at the end of a dispatch—"With every respect, I have the honour to remain, at your service, Thievish!"—Herald.

THE THING ESSENTIAL.—The ingratitude of mankind is sometimes alleged as an excuse for neglecting good offices; but it is the business of a man to perform his own part, not to answer for the returns which others may, or may not, be disposed to make.—Ferguson's Moral Philosophy.

OTAHEITAN MODE OF LIGHTING A FIRE.—A man took two pieces of wood of different degrees of hardness, laid the softer upon the ground, and very rapidly rubbed its length backwards and forwards with the harder. This made a furrow, in which the dust rubbed from the wood collected, and soon became hot; it was then shaken among dry leaves and burst into a flame. The whole process seemed easy and quick; but Mr Hoffman could not succeed in it, though he made many attempts.—Kotzebue's New Voyage round the World.

FACILITY OF SWIMMING.—The lighter the body is in relation to its magnitude, the more easily will it float, and a greater portion of the head will remain above the surface. As the weight of the human body does not always bear the same proportion to its bulk, the skill of the swimmer is not always to be estimated by his success; some of the constituent parts of the human body are heavier, while others are lighter, bulk for bulk, than water. Those persons in whom the quantity of the latter bear a greater proportion to the former, will swim with a proportionate facility.—Lardner's Cyclopædia.

TO COOL WINE.—When ice is used to cool wine, it will be ineffectual if it be applied, as is frequently the case, only to the bottom of the bottle; in that case, the only part of the wine which will be cooled is that nearest the bottom. As the application of ice to the top of the bottle establishes two currents, upwards and downwards, the liquid will undergo an effect in some degree similar to that which would be produced by shaking the bottle. If there be any deposit in the bottom, whose weight, bulk for bulk, nearly equals that of the wine, such deposit will be mixed through the liquid as effectually as if it had been shaken; in such cases, therefore, the wine should be transferred into a clean bottle before it is cooled.—Lardner's Cyclopædia.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

DRURY-LANE.—The Brigand—Nettlewig Hall—And The Ice Witch.
COVENT GARDEN.—King John—Two Strings to Your Bow—And Nesha's Cave.

COVENT GARDEN.

King John was performed here last night for the second time,—the part of Constance by Miss KEMBLE. We did not see it; and we have already spoken of that lady's performance; but we take the opportunity of supplying an omission in our former notice, by saying a word or two of Mr WARDE, who enacts the part of the English Monarch.

King John is the best character that we remember to have seen this player perform; yet we cannot congratulate him on his having the right notion of it. It is indeed a high difficulty for any actor to attain to the right performance of one of SHAKSPEARE's characters; and Mr WARDE, like many a one before him, is to seek in the whole matter. He takes any stage King for SHAKSPEARE's. He does not ventriloquise with the King in the play. He does not throw himself into it, and become part of it; he crowns himself, WARDE,—takes a sceptre into his hand, or an additional elevation into his head,—and thinks that the tip-top of Mr WARDE's manner is the perfection of the poet's design. Oh let him not believe it. The best King John we ever saw was MACREADY's. There was more of the weakness and vacillation of the real historical character in it, than in any other; and the very hair was so dressed, as to resemble the King's upon the coin. What it wanted was the poetry: we do not mean the mouthing and the declamation, but the imaginative grace, —not the consciousness of the wording, but the rich aud varied consciousness of the thoughts. The late Mr KEMBLE's King John was the beau ideal of the King theatrical; very clever too, and not unimpressive in parts, but too conscious, and putting the manner before the matter. Mr WARDE's King John is Mr KEMBLE's, with the ideal taken out of it, and a coarse grain put in. JOHN KEMBLE, though he always gave you the idea of an actor, gave you that of an actor who had something of the romantic or elevated in his own personal character: Mr WARDE succeeds only in giving you that of something peremptory and assuming. The best passage which we saw in his King John was to this effect. It was where he dismissed the Pope's Nuncio, and indignantly thumped the arm of the royal chair in saying that he alone would oppose the church:—

"Yet I alone, alone, do me oppose Against the Pope, and count his friends my foes."

This repetition of the word alone was given with good emphasis and truth. Now if Mr WARDE could have given other passages as well, we should have had to praise his general performance; but in truth he has but one or two ideas in his head, and this luckily fell in with one of them. He is all for pomp, and peremptoriness, and declamation. He thinks of himself, "alone," and how he does a character; not what the character has done for itself. The scene with Hubert, for instance, was a mere mistake. During the greater part of it, he did not even go close to the man. He stood at royal distance, and was evidently all the while preparing to work up the dialogue to the proper patronizing climax, such as actors for effect "get up," not such as crossed the face of a GARRICK with a thousand emotions, or such as KEAN fills with all the suffering of passion, and the graces of excited thought. The scene being carried thus systematically to its close, Mr WARDE expressed his princely satisfaction by a smiling stalk apart, and the galleries took their cue, and applauded.

Mr WARDE is one of those actors designated by the titles of useful and respectable, who sometimes get spoilt by being employed too much, and obtaining too great a salary. In theatres of a proper size, and where there was no horror of a "brother near the throne," or none of the mysteries adverted to in the passage as quoted the other day from the Dramatic Annual, he would find his level, and the critics would respect him more. At present there is an assumption in his bearing, which the premises do not warrant, and which provokes at last the critic to speak out. He has a good person, marked features, and an iron voice not very malleable. When he wishes to be natural in his tones, he can only put them into a state of up and down and sing-song. When he would be forcible, he is only loud and vehement. When he is pathetic, his want of feeling amounts to the ludicrous. He stooped to embrace a child one evening in some melo-dramatic piece (Comrades and Friends, we think) and did it in such a manner, that a gentleman who sat next us turned and said, with a peculiar smile, "Very different from MACREADY!"—No criticism could have been completer.

NETTLEWIG HALL, OR TEN TO ONE.

TO THE TATLER.

SIR,—Your correspondent Justitia, in yesterday's TATLER, has imposed an infamous falsehood upon you. The farce of Nettlewig Hall is in every respect my own; nor do I believe the title has ever before been used. Seven years since, during the management of Mr WILLIAMS, I wrote a musical interlude for the Surrey Theatre, intitled, Maids and Bachelors, which was successfully played twenty nights or more. (My name appeared to it in the bills of the theatre.) Since then, up to the production of Nettlewig Hall, I have not perpetrated any dramatic offence.

The plot of both pieces was my own invention; and I hope it will not be considered a very heinous crime to have attempted an improved edition of my own works.—I am,

Yours, &c.

THE ICE-WITCH.

TO THE TATLER.

SIR,—Perceiving a P.S. to a letter signed Justitia, reflecting upon Mr BUCKSTONE, as to the authorship of The Ice-Witch, in your valuable publication, I beg to observe, with a feeling of regret, that I have been the only avowed accuser of that gentleman with regard to it, and that I am now sorry that I can only do him the imperfect justice of stating that my suspicions were utterly unfounded, and beg to refer you to my letter of apology in the Theatrical Observer of to-day, where my unjust accusation originated.

Yours obediently,
HENRY THOMAS FORD.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

FRIDAY, APRIL 15, 1831.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

Arcana of Science and Art: or an Annual Register of Useful Inventions and Improvements, abridged from the Transactions of Public Societies, and from the Scientific Journals, British and Foreign, of the past year. With several Engravings. Fourth Year. 12mo. pp. 312. Limbird.

Mr Limbird pleaseth us, for he provideth food both for the reason and the imagination. He knoweth that all the faculties of man must be nourished: he wisely discerneth that the public are pleased both with novels and with new science; and the popularity of the strongly contrasted works which he publisheth accordingly, is one among the numerous refutations of the fallacy so invidiously broached a short time since, that the growth of science would be the choking of fancy. Believe it not. Nay, the public no longer believe it. The delusion is gone by. They have had too many proofs of the abundant companionship in which the utile and dulce go together; and they no more expect to see the one rooted out because the other flourishes, than to see the wild flowers vanish from the woods that produce timber for shipping; or to hear the nightingale hush, because it has lighted upon boughs which will be cut up for mathematical instruments! Mr Limbird at one time, gives us a book of Science; at another, an Arabian Nights, for six and sixpence, all in one volume, full of pictures, thumbed, and to be eternally thumbed of children, and other wise men; at the next, Bacon's Essays for eightpence! then Mrs Inchbald's charming novel of Nature and Art, for the same money; then another volume of Science, containing, for five shillings, the most curious extracts from Journals that cost twelve guineas: and then again the Castle of Otranto, or the Castles of Athlyn and Dunbayne, for sixpence! Cheapness and contrast can go no further than this, unless he should give us the poetry of Gray and Collins, at a penny a piece, which might be done in his comprehensive typography. Gray and Collins would hardly make more of one of his sixpenny publications, than would amount to twopence. We are surprised that he has done nothing yet for the Poets. There is a continental edition of the four great Italian Poets, Dante, Petrarch, Ariosto, and Tasso, all in one reasonably sized book in double columns. There is a similar edition in England, we believe, of the whole of the Latin poets. The most popular poets of this country might appear in a similar manner: only if Mr Limbird should speculate upon such a publication, let him get a good author to edit it, otherwise something will be added or left out, without a proper reason. It has been suggested to us, and we think not unhappily, that a folio volume, containing the whole body of English poetry, in double or treble columns, would succeed as a general bookselling speculation.

The volume before us is the fourth of an Annual Series, containing an account of the newest discoveries and observations in science, natural history, domestic economy, &c. It is not a mere set of extracts. Many of the articles appear to be abstracts or abridgments; and the whole is evidently got up in an attentive manner. There is no quackery in the way in which it is put forth. As an obvious instance, the title-page, with modest truth, speaks of the book's having "several engravings;" whereas a less scrupulous editor would have called them numerous. Merit of this kind ought not to be passed over. We proceed to lay before our readers one or two of the most curious passages.

It has often surprised us, that occasion has not been taken from the buoyancy of certain substances in water, to provide against the submersion of great as well as small vessels at sea:—

'On February 26th, at the Royal Institution, Mr Watson gave an account of the means of preventing ships from foundering at seat He illustrated his proposed method by the use of numerous models. and by experimental illustrations of the actual floatage or buoyan, power of certain bulks of different kinds of wood used in shipbuilding. The principle which he adopts, and upon which everything rests, is the buoyant power of tight copper tubes, filled with air, and built in with the vessel, in the variouss convenient situations afforded in the lower part, as between the timbers, under the decks, &c. He illustrated his calculations by a model of an eighty-gun ship, and then drew the results as to expense, saving, &c. upon the same scale. His conclusion was, that the saving of property and lives would be very great, and the adaptation very practicable.'—P. 47.

In the present volume of the 'Arcana,' we have seen for the first time a portion of a treatise which has made a considerable noise, to wit, Mr Babbage's observations on the Decline of Science in this country. They are very curious, and smartly put. We have added to the number of Italics, in order to point out the singular political analogies that are suggested by this criticism upon intellectual bodies corporate. The conclusions to be drawn from them we leave to the reader. He knows our opinion of those societies in general, and how sure they are to degenerate into unintellectual conspiracies of busy-bodies. But we cannot help noticing the laughable subject of fees and bought honours, so well ridiculed by Mr Babbage. Men of mere science are fond of arrogating to themselves the title of philosophers or lovers of wisdom, to which they have no more pretension than to that of lovers of modesty or public spirit. If a Newton were to arise and were to be poor, he could not, it seems, be an F.R.S. because he had not fifty pounds! Even to be a Member of the Royal Society of Literature (a Royal Society of Literature!) demands the meritorious possession of thirty-six pounds fifteen shillings! a sum which anybody who could spare it, would give, not to be a member of that society.

'The progress of knowledge,' observes Mr Babbage, 'having convinced the world that the system of the division of labour and of co-operation, was as applicable to science, as it had been found available for the improvement of manufactures, the want of competition in science produced effects similar to those which the same cause gives birth to in the arts. The cultivators of botany were the first to feel that the range of knowledge embraced by the Royal Society was too comprehensive to admit of sufficient attention to their favourite subject, and they established the Linnean Society. After many years, a new science arose, and the Geological Society was produced. At another, and more recent epoch, the friends of astronomy, urged by the wants of their science, united to establish the Astronomical Society. Each of these bodies found, that the attention devoted to their science by the parent establishment was insufficient for their wants, and each in succession experienced from the Royal Society the most determined opposition.

'Instituted by the most enlightened philosophers solely for the promotion of the natural sciences, that learned body justly conceived that nothing could be more likely to render these young institutions permanently successful, than discouragement and opposition at their commencement. Finding their first attempts so eminently successful, they redoubled the severity of their persecution, and the result was commensurate with their exertions, and surpassed even their wildest anticipations. The Astronomical Society in six years became known and respected throughout Europe, not from the halo of reputation which the glory of its vigorous youth had thrown round the weakness of its declining years; but from the sterling merit of its unpretending deeds, from the sympathy it claimed and received from every practical astronomer, whose labours it relieves and whose calculations it lightened.

'But the system which worked so well is now changed, and the the Zoological and Medico-Botanical Societies were established without opposition: perhaps, indeed, the total failure of the latter society is the best proof of the wisdom which guided the councils of the Royal Society. At present, the various societies exist with no feelings of rivalry or hostility, each pursuing its separate objects, and all uniting in deploring with filial regret the second childhood of their common parent, and the evil councils by which that sad event has been anticipated.

'It is the custom to attach certain letters to the names of those who belong to different societies, and these marks of ownership are by many considered the only valuable part of their purchase on entry. The following is a list of some of these societies. The second column gives the ready-money prices of the tale-pieces indicated in the third:—

'Thus, those who are ambitious of scientific distinction, may, according to their fancy, render their name a kind of comet, carrying with it a tail of upwards of forty letters, at the average cost of 10*l.* 9*s.* 9¼*d.* per letter.

'Perhaps the reader will remark, that science cannot be declining in a country which supports so many institutions for its cultivation. It is indeed creditable to us, that the greater part of these societies are maintained by the voluntary contributions of their members. But, unless the enquiries which have recently taken place in some of them should rectify the system of management by which several have been oppressed, it is not difficult to predict that their duration will be short. Full publicity, printed statements of accounts, and occasional discussions and enquiries at general meetings, are the only safeguard; and a due degree of vigilance should be exercised on those who discourage these principles.

'On the next five societies on the list I shall offer no remarks. Of the geological I shall say a few words. It possesses all the freshness, the vigour, and the ardour of youth, in the pursuit of a youthful science, and has succeeded in a most difficult experiment, that of having an oral discussion on the subject of each paper read at its meetings. To say of these discussions that they are very entertaining, is the least part of the praise that is due to them. They are generally very instructive, and sometimes bring together isolated facts in the science, which, though insignificant when separate, mutually illustrate each other, and ultimately lead to important conclusions. The continuance of these discussions evidently depends on the taste, the temper, and the good sense of the speakers. The things to be avoided are chiefly verbal criticisms—praise of each other beyond its reasonable limits, and contest for victory. This latter is, perhaps, the most important of the three, both for the interests of society and of truth. With regard to the published volumes of their transactions, it may be remarked, that if members were in the habit of communicating their papers to the society in a more finished state, it would be attended with several advantages; amongst others, with that of lightening the heavy duties of the officers, which are perhaps more laborious in this society than in any others. To court publicity in their accounts and proceedings, and to endeavour to represent all the feelings of the society in the council, and to avoid permanent presidents, is a recommendation not peculiarly addressed to this society, but would contribute to the well being of all.

'Of the Astronomical Society, which, from the nature of its pursuits, could scarcely admit of discussions similar to those of the geological, I shall merely observe, that I know of no secret which has caused its great success, unless it be attention to the maxims which have just been stated.

'On the Zoological Society, which affords much rational amusement to the public, a few hints may at present suffice. The largeness of its income is a frightful consideration. It is too tempting as the subject for jobs, and it is too fluctuating and uncertain in its amount, not to render embarrassments in the affairs of the society a circumstance likely to occur, without the greatest circumspection. It is most probable, from the very recent formation of this institution, that its officers and councils are, at present, all that its best friends could wish; but it is still right to mention that in such a society, it is essentially necessary to have men of business on the council, as well as persons possessing extensive knowledge of its pursuits. It is more dangerous in such a society than in any other, to pay compliments, by placing gentlemen on the council who have not the qualifications which are requisite; a frequent change in the members of the council is desirable, in order to find out who are the most regular attendants, and most qualified to conduct its business. Publicity in its accounts and proceedings is, from the magnitude of its funds, more essential to the Zoological than to any other society; and it is rather a fearful omen, that a check was attempted to be given to such enquiries at the last anniversary meeting. If it is to be a scientific body, the friends of science should not for an instant tolerate such attempts.

'The Horticultural Society has been ridden almost to death, and is now rousing itself; but its constitution seems to have been somewhat impaired. There are hopes of its purgation and ultimate restoration, notwithstanding a debt of 19,000*l.* which the Committee of Enquiry have ascertained to exist. This, after all, will not be without its advantage to science, if it puts a stop to house-lists named by one or two persons,—to making complimentary councillors,—and to auditing the accounts, without examining every item, or to omitting even that form altogether.

'The Medico-Botanical Society suddenly claimed the attention of the public; its pretensions were great,—its assurance unbounded. It speedily became distinguished, not by its publications or discoveries, but by the number of Princes it enrolled in its list. It is needless now to expose the extent of its short-lived quackery; but the evil deeds of that institution will long remain in the impression they have contributed to confirm throughout Europe, of the character of our scientific establishments."

Mr Babbage also institutes a fair comparison between the national encouragement of science in England and in France. We have only room for one of his illustrations :—

'The estimation in which the public hold literary claims in France and England, was curiously illustrated by an expression in the translation of the debates in the House of Lords, on the occasion of his Majesty's Speech at the commencement of the Session of 1830. The Gazette de France stated that the address was moved by the Duc de Buccleugh, "Chef de la maison de Walter Scott." Had an English editor wished to particularize that Nobleman, he would undoubtedly have employed the term wealthy, or some other epithets characteristic of that quality most esteemed among his countrymen."—P. 62.

We believe we have given this last paragraph before, but it is worth repeating.

MISS TREE, (NOW MRS BRADSHAW).

TO THE TATLER.

Dear Mr Tatler,—Permit me to remind you of having overlooked Miss Tree in your interesting account of favorite actresses who have been raised by marriage to a rank, which, if they have been ennobled by it in title, some of them have ennobled by their fine qualities, and almost all have adorned.

You will remember, that Miss Tree was married to Mr Bradshaw, a gentleman of fortune, if not of high birth.

This omission will perhaps procure for your readers one of your delightful reminiscences of the Viola and the Clari of the stage; and of the pretty bird-like look and voice, which were rendered more sweet by the feeling which breathed in the earnest tones of the one, and the gentle expression that animated the other. Her graceful figure, and modest ardency of manner—a sort of maiden energy, like that of Imogen,—will doubtless have enshrined her in your memory.

Your admirer, and constant reader,
Wednesday morning. M. E. M.

[Our correspondent has done so well what he (or she) wishes us to do, and painted such an agreeable portrait, that we shall not hazard the spoiling it. We remember Miss Tree very well, and admired her. If there was ever any drawback upon her manner, in our eyes, it was an expression of fastidiousness that we think was occasionally discernable about the mouth. But she was a graceful and interesting actress, with an unusual portion in her style of what may be called the natural ideal. We did not forget her in our list, but we were not sure of the rank of her husband. Martin Folkes, who married a namesake of that gentleman's, was a sort of titled man, for he was a President of the Royal Society.]

THE BOROUGHMONGERS AND CORPORATE RIGHTS OF CARTHAGE.

[We have been favoured with the following interesting memorandum from the Lectures of Mr Edward Clarkson on the Prospects of Society. The Lectures commenced last night at the Mechanics' Institute. We are sorry we are unable to attend. But we trust some of our friends will do so. From what we have seen of their prolegomena, they seem well worthy the attention of a liberal curiosity. The second and third evenings are on the 21st and 28th instant.]

We know little of the internal policy of Carthage. Her external policy is depicted by an enemy—Livy—and many lights on the subject might be thrown by the recovery of his lost books. The little we know of her internal policy is derived from Aristotle's 'Politics,' slightly corroborated by Polybius; but that little is curious; and Mr Clarkson, while analyzing the Carthaginian Constitution, among others, will adduce a curious Analogy between the Ancient Sovereign of the Seas and the Modern. Carthage was at first a pure Republic, with Common tables; but a close corporation of 104 Oligarchs gradually usurped all the offices and patronage of the State; dictated to the popular Assembly and the Monarch, (the Suffetes) and filled the colonies* with their tools; occasionally

* The Royal Society of Edinburgh now requires, for contributions in lieu of annual contributions, a sum dependent on the value of the life of the member.

* Query. Had Carthage colonies in America? Her known colonies were, however, flourishing, and widely diffused in Europe (including England) Asia, and Africa.

giving distant offices to the Opposition, in order to "stop their mouths." Hannibal's family belonged to the Reformers, or Opposition party, and so exasperated were the 104 State Harpies with the thought of disgorging their public plunder, through that party's means, that they stimulated the Romans to oppose their own general; betrayed their country's defender, and caused the obliteration of this great and originally free commercial empire from the face of the earth,—a striking warning to England!!

"In the fall
Of Carthage, think of thine, despite thy watery wall."

ORIGINAL POETRY.

[It is not necessary for us to say, that there is a great deal of merit in the following poem; but we say so to express our pleasure. We need not add, that the anonymous author has our thanks for it.—Ed. Tatler.]

REALITY.

Reality's slave
From the womb to the grave,
Awake! awake! awake!
Wouldst thou nothing but feed
And sleep at thy need?
Awake! for thy soul's sake.

Art thou not a spirit
Ordain'd to inherit
The universe for ever?
And from birth wilt thou creep
To thy worm-tended sleep,
And from thy clay pass never?

The past, the to-come
Inform and illume
Thy present path, pale sleeper!
But thine apathy dull
Makes thy life-cloud more full,
And thy soul's shadow deeper.

From Reality's trance
Thy spirit advance!
Be dreaming! dreaming! dreaming!
Let thy thought's rapid wave
Far, far o'er the grave
Be streaming! streaming! streaming!

QUEEN'S THEATRE.

THE new operetta, called Peccadilloes, which was imperfectly performed on Wednesday, on account of the indisposition of Miss DIX, was last night, for the same reason, postponed. Our criticism is therefore postponed with it.

We saw, in the room of this piece, the farce entitled Every Body's Husband. It is improbable beyond the usual improbabilities of its generation, and not overloaded with humour to make up for it. Yet it has pleasant points too. Mr Alexis Twiselton (Mr GREEN) who comes into the lodging-house of Mrs Pimpernel (Mrs GLOVER) finds himself, to his great astonishment, successively requested by two young ladies, to enact the part of a husband "for half an hour or so," in order to break the first blow of their guardian's anger, on account of marriages which they have contracted with certain non-apparent spouses, whom the old gentlemen have not seen, and whom the audience never do see. Mr Twiselton, who is a gentleman of a sprightly acquiescence, very much at people's service, agrees to do what the ladies require; and accordingly he stands the fire of the two guardians in succession, equally to their amazement and his own. He has no sooner frightened off this pair of square-toes (who, it must be confessed, interfere to very little purpose) than he is requested by the jovial lady of the house, who has a turn for theatricals, to give her the cue in a part which she has in rehearsal. He does so, and a scene of the most energetic tragedy ensues; during which, Mr Theophilus Bunbury (Mr MARSHALL), who comes to lead Mrs Pimpernel's daughter to the altar, enters, unseen by the declaiming parties, and being a gentleman of a mystified turn of mind, is rooted to the spot with amazement, to hear his mother-in-law talk of two sons which he had never heard of, and see her groan, and flounce about, and welter in floods of tears before this dreadful unknown,—her supposed secret husband. He goes away, still unseen, to tell his lawyer, and returns to mystify the lady and her daughter by talking in a style which makes them think him mad. However, he consents at last to go on with the marriage, but departs for a few minutes to speak again with his lawyer, purposely, as it should seem, to gift Mr Twiselton with a fourth imaginary wife, for he asks him to lead the bride to church in his room, to wait there till he rejoins them. Our innocent Lothario acquiesces of course; and being seen in his bridal progress, is reported to the real Mrs Twiselton as a monster of quadrigamy, all his wives being disclosed to her by a succession of complainants. On the return from church however, all the parties are brought together, by favour of the facilities of a lodging-house, and the secret is cleared up.

Mrs GLOVER performs her part admirably well, especially in the scene of the rehearsal. We really think she acts better and better the older she grows; and she is young enough too, in spite of a jovial person, to retain a countenance, the good-humoured freshness of which surprised us, when we saw it the other evening among the spectators at one of the large theatres. Mrs GLOVER is still a good-looking woman on the stage, and she is a better off. Her good-humour must be the secret of her good looks.

Mr GREEN seconded her very well in the scene we have particularized. He always succeeds best, where the scene is intended to be artificial,—to give one the idea of something got up. In general, he is too indiscriminately on the alert. His ease wants ease. He is too full of angles and little hits, nods, becks, &c.; and in all this he does not seem actuated by irresistible animal spirits. That would make the affair a different one. He seems only resolved "to fill up," and to be in motion for fear of betraying a want of substance in his repose. Nevertheless, he is very clever; and contrives, one way or another, not to let the interest flag with the general audience; which is no ordinary merit. Mr GREEN would be useful anywhere, and must be of great value in a small theatre like this.

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

KOSCIUSKO AND THE COSSACKS.—On the invasion of France by the allied troops, a party of Cossacks entered a little village, called Cugny, near Berville, where they pursued their course of spoliation and plunder. They reached a rural habitation, and having broken down the fence which enclosed the grounds, they marched towards the house. At the door they were met by an old man, who endeavoured to point out to them the injustice and cruelty of their unsoldier-like conduct. But the lawless herd brandishing their spears over his head, declared their determination to pillage the cottage. "Soldiers," said the old man, uncovering his bosom, which was scarred by wounds, "you must respect the dwelling of a soldier, or dishonour yourselves by a crime."—"Who are you?" said the leader of the Cossacks, "who know our language, and dare presume to address us thus?"—"I am Kosciusco!" On hearing that name, which is synonymous with glory and virtue, the savage soldiers threw themselves at the hero's feet, and implored his pardon. —Journal of a Nobleman.

EAST WIND.—It is remarkable that good astronomical observations must be made when the wind is east. And frequently when the celestial objects seem to wave and move about in the field of the telescope, an east wind is found to follow, for it has already begun above in the higher regions of the air.—Forster's Natural Phœnomena.

— Moral evil is the blemish of man's nature, short of what is perfect or right; and what he himself feels on this subject, is an evidence that he is not at once what he is destined to become. Complaints of moral evil, are the symptoms of a progressive or improving nature. A being that perceived no moral evil, or no defect, could have no principle of improvement.—Ferguson's Moral Philosophy.

MERIT AND DEMERIT.—Actions are said to have merit or demerit, according to the nature and degree of the moral quality they bear. Actions that express good-will to mankind in the highest degree, have the highest merit. Actions that proceed from malice, and give examples of mischiefs done without inducement or provocation, are of the highest demerit. We express our sense of demerit in the different degrees of crimes, offences, and faults. A crime is an injury done from malice, jealousy, revenge, avarice, or some other passion that sets mankind at variance. An offence is a wrong done in the gratification of some passion in its own nature consistent with amity. A fault is a wrong done from inattention or ignorance.—Ferguson's Moral Philosophy.

PETRARCH'S LIBRARY.—The commencement of the reign of Lorenzo Celsi was distinguished by a magnificent bequest from Petrarch, of which the Venetians have proved themselves but little worthy. The poet appears to have contemplated his visits to the Lagune with no ordinary satisfaction; and, in order more substantially to testify his grateful sense of the frequent hospitality of the Republic, he offered his library as a legacy. In 1362, while the plague was raging at Padua, he had fixed his abode at Venice, which was free from infection; his books accompanied him, and for their conveyance, he was obliged to retain a numerous and expensive stud of baggage horses. On the 4th of September in that year he wrote to the Senate, "I wish, with the good-will of our Saviour, and of the Evangelist himself, to make St Mark heir of my library." His chief stipulations were, that the books should neither be sold nor dispersed, and that a building should be provided, in which they might be secure against fire and weather. The Great Council gladly accepted this liberal donation, and addressed its thanks in terms of courtesy (perhaps not exaggerated, if we remember the times in which they were written) "To a Scholar unrivalled in poetry, in moral philosophy, and iu theology." A palace which belonged to the family of Molina, and in later years was converted into a monastery for the Nuns of St Sepulchre, was assigned as a residence for the poet, and as a depository for his books. * * * * This collection, which formed the nucleus of the now inestimable library of St Mark, though by no means extensive, still contained many treasures of no small price. Among them are enumerated a MS. of Homer, given to Petrarch by Nicolaus Sigeros, Ambassador of the Greek Emperor; a beautiful copy of Sophocles; the entire Iliad, and great part of the Odyssey, translated by Leontius Pilato, and copied in the hand-writing of Boccaccio, whom the translator had instructed in Greek; an imperfect Quinctilian; and most of the works of Cicero, transcribed by Petrarch himself, who professed most unbounded admiration for the great Roman philosopher. The Venetians, to their shame, grievously neglected the poet's gift. When Tomasini requested permission to inspect the books, in the early part of the seventeenth century, he was led to the roof of St Mark's, where he found them, to use his own words, 'partly reduced to dust, partly petrified'—dictu mirum! in saxa mutatos; and he adds a catalogue of such as were afterwards rescued from destruction.—Sketches from Venetian History.

DOMESTIC INSTRUCTION.

A GENTLEWOMAN whose residence adjoins Kensington Gardens, and who has brought up and educated a large family, being at present deserted from her sons having gone out into the world, wishes to RECEIVE into her domestic circle, now consisting only of herself and daughter, TWO LITTLE BOYS, from five to ten years of age, whom she would instruct in the Latin Accidence, and such rudiments as are fitted to prepare them for large or public schools. This arrangement is particularly desirable for little boys whose delicacy of constitution may unfit them for encountering the habits and discipline of a school. The advertiser has been accustomed to pay great attention to the health of her own children, and the same care would be extended to those confided to her charge.—Address A. B. NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

Arcana of Science and Art: or an Annual Register of Useful Inventions and Improvements, abridged from the Transactions of Public Societies, and from the Scientific Journals, British and Foreign, of the past year. With several Engravings. Fourth Year. 12mo. pp. 312. Limbird.

[Concluded.]

AT page 68 is a prodigious puzzle; to wit, Mr Edwards's announcement of his proposed Auticatelephor, or engine for the instantaneous conveyance of intelligence to any distance; that is to say, from a few yards to ten thousand miles or upwards! Mr Edwards tells us, that he has "explained (in confidence) the secret of his invention to several very scientific men, and as competent as any to judge of its merits: among others, the Vice-President of the Royal Society, the Professor of Natural Philosophy and Astronomy in the University of London, and the President of the Mechanics' Institution." He also informs us, that he had previously made an offer to His Majesty's Government upon the subject, without success. He does not say, however, whether the gentlemen to whom he imparted the secret of the invention, expressed their approbation of it; nor why the Government refused to entertain his offer.

'When it is considered,' says Mr Edwards, 'that sound travels only 1,142 feet in a second, or about thirteen miles in a minute; and that the greatest velocity of a cannon-ball has never exceeded 4,000 feet per second; and that light, the fleetest of all things known, requires nearly seven minutes and a half to speed its way from the sun to the earth: few persons will believe it possible for man to have discovered a means of holding, at the distance of hundreds or even thousands of miles, and across the sea, converse with a friend, in the most perfect manner, and on any subject whatever, instantaneously, either by day or night.

'But, before the discovery of the properties of the load-stone, who could have believed that a needle should one day be the seaman's unerring guide, in all sorts of weather, and even the darkest night, to regions the most remote; and over seas that scarcely own a shore? Or who, before the invention of gunpowder, would have ever believed it possible for man to throw a sixty-four pound shot, or a shell weighing two hundred weight, to the distance of a mile and upwards in a few seconds? Or who, before the expansive force of steam was proved, could have believed that the vapour of water should ever give a rapid and continued motion to machinery which the combined strength of more than 100 horses could not stir? Or who, even half a century ago, would have deemed it possible for a human being to have ascended 10,000 feet into the air, and after soaring for an hour above the clouds, to have alighted, in perfect safety, fifty miles from the place of his ascent? Yet all these things have been done, and we no longer wonder at the effect. The public ought not, therefore, to look with too much severity upon a project, though apparently impracticable; but should rather encourage a spirit of laudable research.

'The inventor of the Auticatelephor undertakes to demonstrate clearly and briefly, in the work which he has now in the press, the practicability and facility of transmitting from London, instantaneously, to an agent at Edinburgh, Dublin, Paris, Vienna, St Petersburg, Constantinople, the Cape of Good Hope, Madras, Calcutta, &c. any question or message whatever; and of receiving back again at London, within the short space of one minute, an acknowledgment of the arrival of such question or message at the place intended; and a distinct answer to it in a few minutes.

'In principle this engine is altogether different from every kind of telegraph or semaphor, and requires neither intermediate station nor repetition. In its action it is totally unconnected with electricity, magnetism, galvanism, or any other subtle species of matter; and, although the communication from place to place is instantaneous, and capable of ringing a bell, firing a gun, or hoisting a flag, if required, yet this is not effected by the transit of anything whatever to or fro—nor in the operation is aught either audible or visible except to the persons communicating. It may be proper, however, to state, that a channel or way must previously be prepared, by sinking a series of rods of a peculiar description in the ground, or dropping them in the sea; but these, after the first cost, will remain good for ages to come, if substantial when laid down.'

This is a marvel beyond marvels, taking away one's breath with a vengeance! Here follows a phenomenon, however, of small practical dimensions, but of an inconceivability almost as gigantic as any other:—

'The effect described in the first part of the following communication, for which we are indebted to an officer of the army, and an eye-witness, is so extremely peculiar, that we feel induced to point it out to the attention of our scientific readers, as well worthy of investigation.

'The natives of New South Wales have the art of throwing a curved flat stick, made of very heavy wood, and in the form of a crescent, with such force and accuracy as to break a man's leg at sixty or eighty yards; but the strange peculiarity of it is, that it can also be thrown to the distance of a hundred yards and upwards in the air, and, without striking anything, will return to the person who threw it, and even pass beyond him twenty or thirty yards. A similar stick is used by a people to the southward of Trichinopoly, the Colareese: they, however, only use it for straightforward purposes, and do not understand how to make it return.'

EXTRACTS FROM NEW BOOKS.

TWO HAPPY VICTIMS OF WAR AND DISEASE.

The son of Count Hadik, and the daughter of his intimate friend the Count Amady, had been brought up in such habits of regard for each other, that the strongest possible attachment subsisted between them by the time they had ceased to feel as children. Before the period fixed for their union had arrived, war broke out between Austria and France, and the Emperor called in the aid of his Hungarian troops. According to a custom prevalent in Hungary, the nobility are bound to take a personal part in every war in which the national independence is at stake. Young Hadik was, therefore, obliged immediately to obey the Emperor's call, and remained absent two years. During that period, the beautiful young Countess had been attacked by the small-pox, which committed such ravages on her face, that she herself experienced a feeling of horror when she first saw the dreadful change in a glass. So great was the impression made on her mind by this untoward event, that she had fully resolved never more to suffer young Hadik to set his eyes on her. But before she had been allowed to execute a plan of retreat which she had formed, her lover returned. She consented to see him again; but for the purpose of declaring to him that, as it was impossible for him to expect happiness from his union with one whose appearance had undergone so great a change, she released him from his engagement, and had determined to pass her days in a convent. When the young lovers were brought into each others presence, the young Countess kept her face concealed in her handkerchief, and could not for a long time, prevail upon herself to raise her eyes upon her lover. But when at last she did so, she then perceived for the first time that he was deprived of sight! The explosion of a powder canister had some time before destroyed his powers of vision. The young Countess experienced a mixed feeling of sorrow and delight; but she vowed at once that she would never more leave him, and that she would be his companion and conductor through life. They were immediately married, since when they reside sometimes at the château of the Count Amady at Soreskan, and at others, with the Count Hadik in another part of the country, the one delighted in having secured the continuance of her lover's affection, by his loss of power to appreciate her loss of beauty, and the other happy in finding a partner and constant companion in one whose former love for him was not likely to be diminished from his own misfortune.—Journal of a Nobleman.

CHINESE COURTESY.

Besides the stated periods for drinking, they take wine with one another occasionally, as in England. But when it is done ceremoniously, the parties rise from their chairs with their wine-cups held in both hands, and proceed to the middle of the room. They then raise their cups as high as their mouths, and lower them again until they almost touch the ground,—the lower the more polite. This process is repeated three, six, or nine times, each watching the other's motions with the greatest exactness, nor will one of them drink before the other; after repeated attempts, their cups meet their mouths at one and the same instant, when they empty them, and turn them up so as to expose the inside, and show that every drop has been drunk. After this, they hold the empty cups, and salute one another in the same manner, retreating by degrees towards their chairs, when they sit down to resume their functions at the repast. Here, sometimes, a polite contention takes place who shall be seated the first, and is not decided until after a number of ceremonious bows, nods, curvings of the body, and motions of the hands, when they contrive to lower themselves into their chairs at one and the same moment. At the commencement of the ceremony, when the parties approach one another so as almost to touch their wine cups, they very often exchange them before they begin their salutations.—Dobell's Travels in China.

THE PURPLE MARTIN.

In North America, some birds are enticed to nestle near the houses, by some hospitable preparation for their convenience; more particularly the house-wren, the blue-bird, and the purple martin. Some of the Anglo-Americans have large conveniences constructed for these birds, consisting of numerous apartments, which are for the most part fully tenanted every Spring; and in such swallowries individual birds have been noted to return to the same box for several successive years. This practice of harbouring and protecting the purple martin does not appear to be of European origin, as the aboriginal Americans had adopted a similar practice from time immemorial. The Chataw and Chickasaw Indians, for example, cut off all the top branches from a sapling near their cabins, leaving the prongs a foot or two in length, in each of which they hang a gourd or calabash, properly hollowed out for these birds to nestle in. On the banks of the Mississippi, again, the negroes stick up long canes, with the same species of apartment fixed to their tops, in which the purple martins regularly breed. "Wherever," says Wilson, "I have travelled in this country, I have seen with pleasure the hospitality of the inhabitants to this favourite bird." The following little trait of its domestic history was communicated by Mr Henry, Judge of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania:—"In 1800," says he, "I removed from Lancaster to a farm a few miles above Harrisburgh. Knowing the benefit derivable to a farmer from the neighbourhood of the martin in preventing the depredations of the bold eagle, the hawks, and even the crows, my carpenter was obliged to form a large box, with a number of apartments, for the martin. The box was put up in the autumn. Near and around the house were a number of well-grown apple-trees and much shrubbery, a very fit haunt for the feathered race. About the middle of February the blue-birds came; in a short time they were very familiar, and took possession of the box: these consisted of two or three pairs. By the 15th of May the blue-birds had eggs, if not young. Now the martins arrived in numbers, visited the box, and a severe conflict took place. The blue-birds, seemingly animated by their right of possession, or for the protection of their young, were victorious. The martins regularly arrived about the middle of May, for the eight following years, examined the apartments of the box, in the absence of the blue-birds, but were uniformly compelled to fly upon the return of the latter. The trouble caused you by reading this note, you will be pleased to charge to the martins. A box replete with those beautiful travellers is not very distant from my bed-head. Their notes seem discordant, because of their numbers; yet to me they are pleasing. The industrious farmer and mechanic would do well to have a box fixed near the apartments of their drowsy labourers. Just as the dawn approaches, the martin begins its notes, which last half a minute or more; and then subside until the twilight is fairly broken. An animated and incessant musical chattering now ensues, sufficient to arouse the most sleepy person. Perhaps chanticleer is not their superior in this beneficial qualification; and he is far beneath the martin in his powers of annoying birds of prey."—The Architecture of Birds (Library of Entertaining Knowledge, Vol IX.)

—[In the same work another passage is quoted from Wilson, on the subject of the purple martin, which presents a pleasing picture; for mutual affection or domestic harmony is always pleasing to contemplate, whether in man, beast, or bird:—"During the period in which the female is laying, and before she commences incubation, they are both from home the greater part of the day. When the female is sitting, she is frequently visited by the male, who also occupies her place while she takes a short recreation abroad. He also often passes a quarter of an hour in the apartment beside her, and has become quite domesticated since her confinement. He sits on the outside, dressing and arranging his plumage, occasionally passing to the door of her apartment, as if to enquire how she does. His notes at this time seem to have assumed a peculiar softness, and his gratulations are expressive of much tenderness."]

A TURKISH PASHA IN RUSSIA.

"A Turkish pasha had arrived for the purpose of directing the arrangement relative to the exchange of prisoners made during the late war. This man was one morning put out of humour by one of his Mahometan attendants, whom he forthwith ordered to be beheaded in the yard of the house which he inhabited. Fortunately for the poor violator of the pasha's peace of mind, two Russian soldiers who, as a mark of honor conferred on the three tails of this Ottoman grandee, were standing as sentinels at his door, in sight of the spot chosen for the execution, interfered in time to prevent the shedding of blood. The Duke de Richelieu was soon made acquainted with the matter, and immediately despatched the commandant de la place, General Kobley, to the pasha, to remonstrate with him on this extraordinary conduct The pasha, however, could not be made to understand that his three tails did not authorize him in Russia to take away the life of any of his own Mahometan dependants. He asserted his right of doing so with so much vehemence, that the General, seeing him bent upon the immediate display of it, found it prudent to place his Mahometan excellency in a state of restraint. A military guard was stationed in his room to watch his actions, and was only removed on the pasha's making a solemn promise, not to think again of cutting off any heads in Russia. Many days did not elapse, however, before this same man outstepped the bounds of his authority, in a manner which forced the Duke de Richelieu to give him orders to quit the Russian territory immediately. A young and beautiful Turkish woman, who had been taken prisoner at the storming of Razgrad, was residing at Odessa with the family of General Rajeffsky, who treated her with so much kindness that, having no home of her own, and her parents being both dead, she had no wish or inducement to return to her native country. She had embraced Christianity, had adopted the European costume, and was betrothed to one of the General's aides-de-camp, to whom she was to be speedily united. The pasha made proposals to her that she should return to Turkey, which were rejected without hesitation. One morning, while she was passing by the pasha's residence, some of his attendants seized her, forced her into the house, and brought her into the presence of the pasha, who loaded her with reproaches for her infidelity and treachery to the Mahometan cause, and ordered her to be placed under confinement in another room, from thence to be taken the next day to one of the vessels on board of which the Turkish prisoners were to be embarked. It fortunately happened that Madame Rajeffsky obtained immediate knowledge of these proceedings, and she hastened to the Duke de Richelieu to request his assistance in rescuing the poor girl from the grasp of this despot. A demand was instantly made of the pasha in the Duke's name for the girl's liberation, which was peremptorily refused. The pasha's house was therefore surrounded with soldiers, and the commissary of the police forced his entrance into it, and rescued the captive from the hands of the Turks. On the following day, the pasha was sent under an escort on board of one of the Turkish vessels, and compelled to set sail immediately for Constantinople.—Journal of a Nobleman.

PATERNAL JEALOUSY AND FILIAL PIETY.

The accession of the Doge Celsi occasioned a singular domestic jealousy. His father, accustomed to the exercise of paternal authority, felt reluctant to acknowledge the elevation which his son had attained above himself; and the churlish old man, unable to brook a superiority which he considered to be a violation of the course of Nature, in order to avoid uncovering himself in the presence of the Doge, adopted a habit of going always bare-headed. Lorenzo, actuated by a better feeling, ingeniously devised a pretext which might at once relieve his father's ridiculous scruple, and obtain for himself the honour due to his station. He embroidered a Cross upon the Ducal cap, and the superstitious dotard no longer refused the customary mark of respect. 'It is not,' he said, 'to you, my son, that I bow, but to the Cross. Having given you life, it is not possible that I should be your inferior.' The conduct of the Doge was wise and affectionate; but how far more touching was the unextorted filial piety which Roper has so simply and beautifully recorded of Sir Thomas More, when filling the exalted post of Lord Chancellor. 'Whensoever he passed through Westminster Hall to his palace in the Chancery, by the Court of King's Bench, if his father (one of the Judges thereof) had been seated ere he came, he would go into the same court, and there reverently kneeling down in the sight of them all, duly ask his father's blessing; and if it fortuned that his father and he, at pleadings in Lincoln's Inn, met together (as they sometimes did) notwithstanding his high office, he would offer in argument the pre-eminence to his father, though he, for his office-sake, would refuse to take it.'—Sketches from Venetian History.

LA FONTAINE.

La Fontaine, the celebrated French fabulist, is recorded to have been one of the most absent of men, and Furetière relates a circumstance, which, if true, is one of the most singular distractions possible. Fontaine attended the burial of one of his friends, and sometime afterwards he called to visit him. At first he was shocked at the information of his death, but recovering from his surprise, he observed, "It is true enough, for now I recollect I went to his burial."—The generous and witty Madame de la Sablière furnished him with a commodious apartment in her house; and one day having discharged all her servants in a pet, declared that she had only retained three animals in her house, which were her dog, her cat, and La Fontaine. In this situation he continued twenty years. * * * * * * It was difficult to restrain him sometimes when on a particular subject. One day, dining with Molière and Despreaux, he inveighed against the absurdity of making performers speak "aside" what is heard by the stage and the whole house. Heated with this idea, he would listen to no argument. "It cannot be denied," exclaimed Despreaux in a loud key—"it cannot be denied that La Fontaine is a rogue, a great rogue, a villain, a rascal, &c." multiplying his terms of abuse, and encreasing the loudness of his voice. Fontaine, without paying any regard to his abuse, went on declaiming. At last the company's roar of laughter recalled him to himself. "What is this burst of laughter about?" said he. "At what?" cried Despreaux, "why, at you, to be sure: you have not heard a word of the abuse which I have been bawling in your ears, yet you are surprised at the folly of supposing a performer not to hear what another actor whispers at the opposite side of the stage." * * * * * *

La Fontaine being one day with Boileau, Racine, and other men of eminence, among whom were ecclesiastics, St Austin was talked of for a considerable time, and with the highest commendation. Fontaine listened with his natural air; and at last after a profound silence, asked one of the ecclesiastics, with the most unaffected seriousness, whether he thought that St Austin had more wit than Rabelais? The doctor, eyeing Fontaine from head to foot, answered only by observing, "that he had put on one of his stockings the wrong side out," which happened to be the case.—The nurse who attended Fontaine in his illness, observing the fervour of the priest in his exhortations, said to him, "Ah, good sir, don't disturb him so; he is rather stupid than wicked;" and at another time—"God won't have the heart to damn him."—In the year 1692, he was seized with a dangerous illness; and when the priest came to converse with him about religion, concerning which he had hitherto been totally unconcerned, though he had never been considered either an infidel or a libertine, Fontaine told him that he had lately bestowed some hours in reading the New Testament, which he thought a good book. The priest some time after represented to him that he had received intelligence of a certain dramatic piece of his, which was soon to be acted, but that he could not be admitted to the sacraments of the church unless he suppressed it. This appeared too rigid, and La Fontaine appealed to the Sorbonne, who confirming what the priest had said, the penitent threw the piece into the fire without keeping even a copy. The priest then laid before him the evil tendency of his Tales; he told him that while the French language subsisted, they would be a most dangerous inducement to vice; and that he could not justify administering the sacrament to him, unless he would promise to make a public acknowledgment of his crime at the time of receiving it, and a public acknowledgment before the Academy of which he was a member in case he recovered; and to exert his utmost endeavours to suppress the book. Fontaine thought these very severe terms, but at length yielded to them all. He died on the 13th of April 1695.

TORY ANOMALY.

TO THE TATLER.

Sir,—It appears to me that the word "Reform" bears an anomalous import in the mouth of a Tory, or (as there have been "right and left-hand defections," causing that name to have an indefinite signification) an anti-Reformer,—one of that class upon whom the mantle of Muggleton and his associates has fallen,—a Millenium man, who, without mincing matters, roundly asserts, that whatever our Constitutions may be, our Institutions have arrived at their state of perfection; who holds that "the greatest-happiness principle" is already in full operation; that however change, revolution, or alteration may have been justifiable, they are so no longer, because, having after a six thousand years' walk reached the top of the hill, our next step must be downwards. Now I submit, Mr Tatler, to the good sense of your readers, whether such a word as reform ought to find a place in your political vocabulary of such persons. (I do not include a minority, who, allowing evil, apprehend from its overthrow a counterbalancing subversion of "social distinctions;" and who, doubtless, in espousing the cause of mother church, bear in mind having heard within her walls, a sermon from "Do thou not evil, that good may come.") Johnson, in defining "Reform," quotes from Arbuthnot, "to pass, by change, from worse to better;" but as with the anti-Reformers, "the worse" already appears "the better side," it is plain that there can be with them no sort or degree of reformation. The argument, Sir, gains strength from the successive epithets applied to the word "Revolution," which though "glorious" in 1688, became less so as years rolled on, up to the Duke of Wellington's Administration, when the tables are turned, and Revolution becomes "unfortunate." The sacred recollections, too, which cling to the term "Reformation," are not sufficient to shield from contumely its descendant, "Reform." Having thus proved the "de jure" extirpation of Reform and Revolution from the Tory Dictionary, I think we have a slice of evidence also on the "de facto" side, in Mr John Wilson Croker's attack on Johnson; for, after such an introduction, it will be very easy for the Right Honourable Gentleman to invade his Dictionary, and make us all nameless by expunging the obnoxious words. I would seriously recommend this plan to the Opposis tion. The name of a Tory is becoming now a bye-word; can its possessor revenge himself better on your Reformer than by making his name one also? The objection as to robbery will be done away with, by the acute Sir Charles Wetherell, who will define a Dictionary to be "not a corporation;" and ("sub rosâ" to Mr Croker) the plan is as likely to succeed as any which will again make the "predicating" Prince Prime Minister, or restore him to the Treasury benches.

I am, Mr Tatler,
Your constant reader and well-wisher,
Agis.

An Ill Omen Explained.—When an owl hoots or screeches, sitting on the top of a house, or by the side of a window, it is said to foretell death. The fact seems to be this:—The owl, as Virgil justly observes, is more noisy at the change of weather, so the owl seems, by a mistaken association of ideas, to forebode the calamity. —Forster's Natural Phœnomena.

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

Russian Population.—It is asserted that the Russian Empire has acquired forty millions of inhabitants in the course of a century. —Edinburgh Journal of Science.

— All the oak in Sweden belongs to the King, or the proprietors of estates can only dispose of it to Government; so that, when not wanted for the navy, it is often left to decay, and indeed is generally much neglected.

Susceptibility.—There is now living in Spalding an old widow lady, upwards of eighty years of age, who declares she never shed a tear these fifty years, during which time she has buried three loving husbands.

Polite Intimation.—In a late number of the Sydney Gazette, appears the following amusing advertisement:—"Notice to Gentlemen Housebreakers and Thieves.—J. Warman will feel obliged to the intruders that broke into his domicile on Sunday morning last, between the hours of one and two, to return him the small quantity of plate they took that morning. J. Warman would not trouble them, but the articles are family presents."

Bituminous Spring in the United States.—The Louisville Advertiser states, that a spring of rock oil has been discovered in the county of Cumberland, while boring a rock for water On reaching a depth of 130 feet, the oil gushed out, forming a jet of twelve or fourteen feet above the ground. It flowed out at the rate of seventy-five gallons in a minute, and very soon formed a little stream, which ran into the Cumberland river, and covered its surface to a considerable distance. The oil burns well, and gives a brilliant light. Abundance of salt water has been found in the neighbourhood, on boring to 200 feet, and rising to the height of 25 feet above the level of the Cumberland river.

Floral Calendar.—By a familiar acquaintance with flowers, we may know not only the coming weather, but the time of day, and the time of year. Linnæus is said to have possessed such a knowledge of the period and indication of flowers, that he wanted neither a watch, a calendar, nor a weather-glass.—Forster's Natural Phœnomena.—[It is very true that those who are surrounded by a variety of plants may gain all this information from them, but then it should be observed, that this natural calendar or time-piece varies with the climate, not only of different countries, but of different parts of the same country.]

— A scene, in which there were no accessions of good to be gained, or, what is equivalent, no apparent evils to be removed, would be a scene of inaction adverse to the nature of man. In other words, a being that perceived no evil, or had no want, could have no principle of activity. The enjoyments of men are observed to depend, not on the measure of external accommodations, but on the part they act; not on their safety, but on the degree of courage they possess; not on what they gain for themselves or others, but on the degree of ardour and affection they exert.—Ferguson's Moral Philosophy.

Paradise.—Where Paradise was, has been much debated and little agreed; but what sort of place is meant by it may perhaps easier be conjectured. It seems to have been a Persian word, since Xenophon and other Greek authors mention it, as what was much in delight among the kings of those Eastern countries. * * * So that a Paradise among them seems to have been a large space of ground, adorned and beautified with all sorts of trees, both of fruits and of forest, either found there before it was enclosed or planted after; either cultivated like gardens for shades and for walks, with fountains or streams, and all sorts of plants usual in the climate, and pleasant to the eye, the smell, or the taste; or else employed, like our parks, for enclosure and harbour of all sorts of wild beasts, as well as for the pleasure of riding and walking; and so they were of more or less extent, and of different entertainment, according to the several humours of the princes that ordered and enclosed them. Semiramis is the first we are told of in story that brought them in use through her empire, and was so fond of them, as to make one wherever she built, and in all or most of the provinces she subdued—which are said to have been from Babylon as far as India. The Assyrian kings continued this custom and care, or rather this pleasure, till one of them brought in the use of smaller and more regular gardens: for, having married a wife he was fond of, out of one of the provinces, where such paradises or gardens were much in use, and the country lady not well bearing the air or enclosure of the palace in Babylon, to which the Assyrian kings used to confine themselves—he made her gardens, not only within the palace, but upon terraces raised with earth, over the arched roofs, and even upon the top of the highest tower: planted them with all sorts of fruit-trees, as well as other plants and flowers, the most pleasant of that country; and thereby made at least the most airy gardens, as well as the most costly, that have been heard of in the world. This lady may probably have been a native of the provinces of Chasimer or of Damascus, which have, in all times, been the happiest regions for fruits of all the East, by the excellence of soil, the position of mountains, the frequency of streams, rather than the advantages of climate: and it is a great pity we do not see the history of Chasimer, which Monsieur Bernier assured me he had translated out of Persian, and intended to publish; and of which he has given such a taste, in his excellent Memoirs of the Mogul's country.—Sir William Temple on Gardening.

SUCCESSIVE CHANGES OF WIND.—Kites made of paper, such as are usually flown by boys, may be converted into useful prognostics of the wind. When several of them are let up together, the higher ones being successively tied to the back sticks of those below them, they will ascend to a vast height. We have known the upper kite in these cases ascend to above 1000 feet high. When the upper one gets a different direction from the lower one, the wind will frequently be found to get into the quarter indicated by the upper kite. This law respecting winds is more strikingly manifested by means of small air-balloons, whose varying directions, as they ascend, portend the successive changes of the wind, which often take place first in the higher regions of the air.—Forster's Natural Phœnomena.

TRAVELLING IN KAMTSCHATKA.—The winter, as I have already said, is very unpleasant, from the heavy snows, which, drifting from the mountains, often bury the houses, so that the inhabitants are compelled to dig a passage out, while the cattle walk on its frozen surface over their roofs. Travelling in this season is very rapid and convenient. The usual mode is in sledges drawn by six or more dogs. The only danger is from snow-storms. The traveller, surprised by this sudden visitation, has no chance for safety, except in quietly allowing himself and his dogs to be buried in the snow, and relieving himself from his covering when the storm is past. This, however, is not always practicable; should the storm, or, as it is called here, purga, overtake him in the ravine of a mountain, such an immense quantity of snow becomes heaped upon him, that he has no power to extricate himself from his tomb. These accidents, however, seldom occur; for the Kamtschatkans have acquired, of necessity, great foresight in meteorology, and of course never undertake a journey when they do not consider themselves sure of the weather.—Kotzebue's New Voyage round the World, in 1823, &c.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

The Speech of M. D. Hill, Esq. at a Public Dinner, given to him by the Electors of Newark, on Thursday, March 10, 1831. 8vo. pp. 28. Effingham Wilson.

This lively speech was made at Newark by Mr Hill, the Barrister, after one of the struggles in that town to prevent the Duke of Newcastle from sending a man to represent his Grace in Parliament, instead of the inhabitants. Mr Hill is one of the sons of the estimable Mr Hill of Birmingham, who has done so much to diffuse liberal education; and perhaps there is nothing of which his father has more reason to be proud, than that his son has remained liberal in spite of being a lawyer. None ought to know more of the good as well as mistaken side of human nature, than lawyers; and none are more able to serve it, than those who act in the spirit of this gentleman: but owing to the license which they allow themselves, of pleading all causes indiscriminately, they become at last too willing to think ill of human nature, in order to reconcile to themselves their own degradation. If a bad construction is to be put upon a man's conduct, the lawyers are generally the men to put it. If a virtue is to be recognized in its struggle with adversity, they are not the gods to take delight in the spectacle, or the worshippers to believe in it. If a good is to be done the world, they are never the first proposers of it, rarely the advocates, and it would be laughable to expect them to be the martyrs. Were they martyrs to anything, it would be in behalf of a custom or a precedent; and this is possible: for most men are more virtuous than they take themselves to be; if they cannot dare to be good on a great scale, or for a purpose in which they doubt whether opinion will go with them, they can shew the immortal spark within them, by the endurance of the last blows for some corporate absurdity. But as to what concerns the interests of the world at large, lawyers generally think as little, and know as little about it, as the spider weaving his web in a corner to catch flies. They even resent a supposition to the reverse, as a slur on their understandings; and owe you, not unnaturally, a grudge for thinking too well of them. Therefore, as Bacon (who by the way could not help praising like a lawyer, and leaving us in doubt whether his panegyric was not an irony) said of King James, that so much learning as his Majesty possessed, would have been marvellous in any king, but in a king born, was miraculous; so we may say of two or three lawyers whom we now happen to possess, the gentleman before us included, that to see a lawyer, at any time, come forward with liberal sentiments, is extraordinary; but to know that he has been bred a lawyer, and yet advocated them in times unfavourable, must give us such an opinion of him, as may well induce him to triumph at a moment like the present. The extraordinary spectacle, now presented to the community, of worldly success on the side of unworldly opinion, must, to a lawyer above all other men, be the most transporting, if he has had the unprofessional virtue to stand by it, when it was a bankrupt in the courts.

'Sir,' says Mr Hill, to the chairman at this public dinner, 'I observed the health of his Majesty's ministers, which was received with so much enthusiasm, was new to your lips. Your character, as an old and steady reformer, is my guarantee that I am not mistaken. It was new to me: for I, like yourself, have the proud recollection that I did not take up my principles because I saw them adopted in high places; nor am I of that large and powerful class who, it now seems, were always the friends of Parliamentary Reform, although they kept the secret so strictly from all the world and from each other, that one sometimes doubts if they entrusted it even to themselves. I have the honour to be surrounded by many men who have been called on to give severer proofs of their attachment to public liberty than any which have been required from me; and I ask them with confidence, if they would now change the memory of those sacrifices, for the possession of all the benefits which could have flowed from cowardice and servility. Such men may claim from the world a just confidence in their integrity, which cannot be given to the tardy convert, however pure his motives, or sincere his conviction. When, therefore, we use the language of praise and confidence towards the holders of power, we shall fear no suspicion of our motives, however rare it has been in the history of the world that the honest advocate of the people could speak of the government of this or any other country with thanks and congratulation. Sir, I do speak of that great measure, which ministers have offered to Parliament and the nation, with unbounded gratitude; not that I find my private and peculiar notions have been entertained by the framers of the bill—not but that I disapprove of several important particulars. I speak thus, Sir, because I feel the deep conviction in my mind, that the Bill proves itself to be the work of honest, sincere reformers; because I feel that the great end of all Reform will be obtained,—a House of Commons substantially representing the people. With this conviction, I am almost glad to be called on to sacrifice, in some points, my own long-cherished speculations. I am proud to show, in common with all my fellow reformers, that we are not factious and unreasonable sticklers for our own opinions—more anxious for the adoption of our nostrums, than for preserving that unanimity of feeling on which the success of our common cause depends. Sir, I cannot witness without emotion that rare and interesting phenomenon, the possessors of unhallowed power calling aloud for its abolition. I could not without shame behold the sacrifices of wealth and influence made by the Russells, the Howards, and the Smiths, if I refused to give all that I have to offer, and all that is demanded of me,—my speculative opinions. This I believe to be the feeling which animates every English heart; and nowhere, judging from experience, do I expect the feeling to be stronger than in the town of Newark.'

We do not conceive that the reformers have given up their "speculative opinions," to the extent that Mr Hill supposes,—much less, that they would allow them to be called "nostrums;" but perhaps he only means that they waive them for the present, or merge them in that great measure, which is to fetch out whatever good may be in them at last. Of this, however, we shall speak more presently. We shall first make two or three more extracts from the speech of Mr Hill; two of them containing good memorandums for Mr Croker; and the third, an excellent answer to the cant about the men of talent, which Boroughmongering enables to enter Parliament; one of the absurdest, by the way, of all cants, and which was overthrown by one sturdy blow from Mr O'Connell, when he said that the house might have been better without such men as Burke and Canning. Mr Hill has put the case still more strongly, when he says that he might dislike such men in exact proportion to their talents; and he has illustrated it in a happy manner, by the metaphor of the cannon:—

'I ought, Sir, to apologise for taking up so much of your time; but I cannot sit down without making one or two remarks on the arguments, as I will in courtesy call them, which have been used in the discussion by the opponents of the Bill.

'The first in order is, that the demand for Reform is the creation of a few weeks of extraordinary excitement, which a little firmness on the part of the Parliament would show to be evanescent, and which may, therefore, be refused with perfect safety. This notable statement was made at the greatest length, and enforced with the greatest earnestness, by Mr Croker, who had taken the trouble to ascertain the number of petitions for Reform which have been presented in the last few years. He told the House, that until the present year, 1831, these petitions were so few, as to show that the public had been indifferent on the subject, until a very recent period. Truly, one would have supposed the Right Honorable Gentleman must have himself forgotten, or have supposed that everybody else had forgotten, the events of his own parliamentary life;—not a very short one, as I remember his name in the debates from my boyhood. If I mistake not, he made his parliamentary debut by cross-examining the celebrated Mrs Clarke—this was the public service to which I believe he owed his appointment as secretary to the Admiralty. Does Mr Croker forget the events of the year 1817, 1818, and 1819, when petitions for Reform in Parliament, signed by three millions of Englishmen, were laid on the table of the House of Commons? Does he forget the species of redress produced by these petitions?—the suspension of the Habeas Corpus, the Six Acts, and the Manchester massacre! Did he suppose us so stupid as to proceed for ever in the hopeless course of petitioning, after this convincing proof of its being worse than futile? I can tell Mr Croker, that many sincere and enlightened

Reformers resolved never more to petition Parliament on any subject. I think the only difficulty which was felt in renewing the habit of presenting petitions in favour of Reform, was the difficulty of removing that settled determination from the minds of some of the best and most ardent friends to the measure, although the altered state of circumstances invited and justified the most active exertions.

'A statement appeared a day or two ago in some of the newspapers, which must have startled those who were unprepared for it. By that statement, it was shewn that the number of the journals in favour of the Reform, compared with those which opposite, was in the proportion of five or six to one; and when the number of copies dispersed by each journal is taken into account, the proportions of newspapers representing readers are much greater, probably more than ten to one. Now, will it be said that the newspapers do not speak the opinions of their readers? Surely if there ever were a fair mode of election invented, it is that by which every man chooses the newspaper which he believes to be the best representative of his opinions and wishes. No one is bribed to read the Times or the Morning Herald, or turned out of his house if he does not vote for the Standard. Now I would ask Mr Croker, if this change in the public press of England is a thing of yesterday? Has it not been gradually going on for years, hastened and retarded at particular times, no doubt varying its rate, and perhaps for a moment receding, but on the whole moving onwards? The hasty observer of the tide of politics may be deceived, as you may be if you stand on the beach and look carelessly at the flux and reflux of the waves. You may suppose the tide to be on the ebb when it is in full flow, and you may chance to get a ducking for your inadvertence, fortunate if you escape without more serious injury. Those, however, who are not so absorbed in the present moment, but that they have the power of comparing it accurately with the past, will be at no loss to trace the gradual and natural progress towards that state of things, which has produced such astonishment, real or affected, on the minds of our opponents.'

* * * * * * *

'I am amused, Sir, at the necessity for close boroughs, so often reiterated in the House, and so seldom mentioned elsewhere, viz. that they are the only portals by which men of talent can enter Parliament. At first sight one does not see what peculiar aptitude Boroughmongers have for discovering talent. It cannot be that like attracts like; for, as a body, they never were suspected of any brilliancy.

'It is pleasant to think of Sir Mark Wood or Sir Masseh Lopez going abroad, like old Hopkins the witch-finder, looking out for those secret marks of talent which are concealed from the profane eyes of the people at Manchester and Birmingham.

'Suppose, however, the Boroughholders have this preternatural power of discovering talent, I must be assured of the manner in which that talent is to be employed, before I admit that the people are benefitted: perhaps I may dislike the Boroughmonger's representative in exact proportion to his talent. If a town were called on to consent to a fort being erected in their neighbourhood, it would not be quite sufficient to tell the inhabitants that the cannon should be of large bore and well supplied with ammunition: nor would it be enough to add, that the gunners would be excellent marksmen, the flash peculiarly brilliant, and the report exceedingly sonorous. It would not be impertinent in the townsmen to inquire which way the muzzles were to be turned; and if it was found that they were likely to point towards them, instead of their enemies, it would be hard to impugn their taste, though they should prefer those dull and silent imitations of artillery, called by the seamen, with more humour than decorum, Quakers, and which might well typify a dumb member of the House of Commons, if you could deprive him of his vote.'

After thanking Mr Hill for these lively and sensible remarks, we, shall now repeat, without agreeing with the startling sallies lately made by Mr Henry Hunt against the Reform Bill (which we have been sorry to see) that so far from conceiving the reformers to have given up their "speculative opinions," we believe them to consider those opinions as containing the ultimate good to be produced by this bill. At least, this is the case with ourselves, who, if we belong to any party, may, perhaps, claim the honour of being entitled Benthamites; and we feel certain, that it is equally the case with all who have strongly advocated the Ballot, and felt for the poor. Nor from this admission, let any boroughmongering slave suppose that we are affording him another particle of ground on which to exult against Ministers; for it is our firm belief, and we shall express it as plainly as we can, to shew the strength of it, that if the Reform contemplated by Ministers were not to take place, the gutters of Piccadilly and St James's street would run with blood. In other words, if the meditated revolution, as they call it, does not take place, a revolution most awful will take place, and one that will pay no more respect to the rich and their privileges, that to so many puppets of St Januarius, stuck into the mud of Mount Etna to hinder its eruption. The great flood of knowledge is increased; it is rising every day; the noise is in all ears but those that are deaf and ringing with the congestion of their luxuries; and if this timely and quiet measure be not taken to let it in, and turn it into sources of fertility, it will burst down every barrier before it, and make a frightful devastation,—

'It mare proruptum, et pelago premit arva sonanti.'

We like the present Reform, because we think it will bring a better, and bring it in a good and kindly manner; and because we think, that without it there will be a change, destructive to many, and, for a period, worse for all. We are very honest in saying this, for we are not at all sure, that the final improvements we look to would not be hastened by a convulsion; but all the mistakes that human beings are liable to, and all the evils they suffer in consequence, come across our imaginations, and soften us towards the most heartless of the corruptionists; and we feel, in the impressive language of Scripture, that God or Good (for the terms, like the Spirit, are synonimous) "desireth not the death of a sinner, but rather that he should turn from his wickedness, and live."

This is the answer the Reformers should make to charges of ulterior views. They should shew their enemies, that it is for the common good of all, enemies included, that they wish this measure to take place; and that if it does not take place, their enemies will be worse off than they. Lord Caernarvon, whose brother, by the way, has six livings in the church worth three thousand a year, has asked, what the Birmingham Reformers meant, by saying that they could raise an army larger than that of Waterloo, in case of necessity? and whether people's houses were to be battered about their ears? The Birmingham Reformers meant, that if the Boroughmongers should act as unconstitutionally in their resistance to the will of king and people, as they do in the fact of their boroughmongering, the people would fight like good and loyal subjects against bad ones: and certainly if they were to do so, it is not the Reformers' houses that would be the most likely to suffer. The holders of those houses are, therefore, kind to their enemies in advocating a measure which they think will prevent the necessity of those legal assaults and batteries. They would fain save the misguided innocence of my Lord Carnarvon, who does not know, it seems, what the oligarchy means; and who thinks, that to get warm with "an excellent dinner," is the way to argue properly respecting the interests of those who have neither meat nor fire. His lordship is like the king in the story, of whom the poet says, that when he had dined, he concluded all his subjects must be as happy as himself;—

'Quand il avoit dîné, croyoit son peuple heureux.'

We grant, with regard to "speculative opinions," that it is impossible for an honest reformer to say how much his opinions might be modified by what took place in a truly National Parliament. We are at present as strong advocates for the Ballot as before, and do not see how the country can dispense with it, any more than the Parliament itself, which has found it necessary for its own internal convenience. But the more corrupt the Parliament, the more necessary, we allow, the Ballot has been for it. If a perfectly incorruptible Parliament could be found, or rather, a Parliament above all the known weaknesses of individual self-interest and self-love, then a Parliament would have no need of the Ballot. And if the community were improved in its condition to a degree far below this, Ballot might not be necessary for the electors of a Parliament. We should be heartily glad that such should be the case. Nothing pleases us better at this moment, than the belief that Society will one day be able to dispense with precautions of this nature. We only think, in the meantime, that Ballot is one of the passages through which it must proceed to that state of things. It is the pain before the pleasure,—the husk that encloses the nut. We cannot see any ultimate security for a just state of things between man and man, or for the real comfort of any description of persons, as long as primogeniture shall exist: and yet if an honest Parliament could shew us good reasons why it should, we have a right to believe ourselves capable of being convinced by them, because we have a mathematical passion for the truth, and have been convinced many times, in the course of our existence, by the arguments of a private conversation. What we desire, is sincerity in the words of law-givers, and happiness in the cheeks of the people. It has lately been said, and by many persons believed, in consequence of the insincerity that prevails in politics, that our "patriot king," at present so beloved, and with so much apparent justice, is hostile to the measure to which he has given his countenance, and that he will fail in standing by it at the last moment. We have always thought that in King William, the natural joviality and good-humour of the man must have dashed aside the ordinary prejudices of the sovereign, and enabled him to sympathize with the honest flesh and blood, to which he naturally belongs; but we never thought, that "being a king," as Bacon says, he would be without the misgivings of a king; or not doubt, now and then, whether all that was to be done for the many, at the seeming expense of the few, would not take some unknown good or satisfaction from princes who are the crown of the few. We always thought, that there would be occasionally some struggle in him to this effect, especially when we saw him riding about with his guards, or read of him in levees, or at dinners, or otherwise occupied in the pomp and circumstance of his station. A King is made to feel himself so different from all other men, in everything that constitutes his kingship, that we thought it impossible that he should at all hours, and under every circumstance, be equally able to consider himself as a man among men, a fellow creature who was simply to do good to his fellow-creatures, and be content with their homage accordingly. Nor shall we be astonished, nor lay it very grievously to his charge, if he should not come up to the expectations of the Reformers after all; but we should be grievously sorry. The reasons we need not mention, after what we have written above. There is a King now in France, who is reigning because kingship has misbehaved itself; and yet so perilous does this quality seem to be to princes, however bred up, that it is clear to us at the present moment, he cares much more for his kingship than for anything else, and that France would have told a very different story to Europe, about Italy and the Poles, had the Three Glorious Days of July been followed by a republic. We were among those who applauded the setting up of a "citizen king," because, under all the circumstances, we thought it better for France, at the moment, than a republic. We grieve to say, that we are sorry we did so, especially as our heart misgave us while we did it. The Poles are doing gloriously without them; and so far, so good. But why must the many be eternally working out their salvation through blood and tears, while the few are bowing in court dresses to one another, and consolidating their paltry conveniences?

May no such question be ever asked, to the subversion of the fair fame, and the happy auspices, of the reign of William the Fourth.

DRURY LANE.

A NEW operatic drama, of an agreeable description, and containing more novelty than usual, was produced here on Saturday night, under the title of the Legion of Honour. It is taken from a French piece called Le Centenaire, and has been adapted to the English stage by Mr PLANCHE. The first part of the list of the dramatis personæ is a curiosity:—

Phillippe Galliard, aged 102 - -	Mr FARREN.
Jerome Galliard, his son - - -	Mr DOWTON.
Pierre Galliard, his grandson - -	Mr LISTON.
Antoine Galliard, his great-grandson -	Mr BLAND.

There is a little boy in the piece, whom it is a pity they did not make the great-great-grandson. It might have been contrived without injury to the story, by making him the son of a great-granddaughter. The sight of the family-series in the play-bill reminded us of the old story of the elderly man, who was seen coming out of a house, pursued by an older man that was beating him; upon which the latter, being asked why he did it, said, "Ungracious boy! He has been beating his grandfather." There is a stick going forward in the present story, but it is always in due order.

Phillippe Galliard, the Centenaire, is a retired soldier living in a village, where his son Jerome is in love with the landlady of the auberge, (Mrs ORGER), and his grandson with the landlady's niece, (Mrs WAYLETT), who rejects him for a gallant young gardener, (Mr HARLEY), who was formerly a corporal of dragoons. The graver interest of the piece turns upon the old soldierly feelings and venerable feebleness of the great-grandfather; and the jokes of it, upon the disinclination of the son and grandson to consider themselves elderly, the son, (who is seventy), constantly complaining that he has been in love to no purpose with Madame la Ronde ever since he was sixty-five; and the grandson, (who is fifty) piquing himself on being in the prime of life, and saying how natural it is in him to "run after the girls," which is an offence that his father is always charging him with. The reader may guess how many pleasantries arise out of a perversion of ideas, at once so extravagant, and yet, considering the great age of the progenitor, not unnatural. The grandson, in a fit of unusual candour, excited by indignation, tells his father that he has been "at the age of discretion these thirty years." Madame la Ronde, who is a very gentle landlady, such as an English author would not have been likely to paint, is afraid of saying nay to her peppery lover the father, but puts him off whenever he presses her to name the wedding day, with, "Well, we shall see—we shall see:" a burthen to her song, which he repeats with great bitterness. The grandson is equally mortified at his non-success with the fair niece; and a quarrel springs up between him and the gardener, which produces an agreement between them to fight a duel in a gravel-pit.

Affairs are in this posture, when a company of soldiers comes into the village, the Captain of whom is the great-grandson. He has risen to that rank by his merit, and is decorated with the cross of the Legion of Honour. Furthermore, he brings with him another cross, to be given to an elder Galliard, in return for his services in the year 1777. He first discloses himself to his father, who, though no very pleasant person, is delighted to see his son, and quite overcome with the thought of receiving the cross; but his transport is turned into a double mortification, when he finds the cross given him for some supposed services in the year seventy-seven, a period, he scornfully says, when he was not even born! They conclude, therefore, that it must be for the grandfather. The grandfather is equally delighted, and equally mortified, having been but a mere infant, he says, at that time (to wit, sixteen years of age); and moreover, he calls to mind that he never performed any military service that he was aware of, except having once assisted in getting a baggage-waggon out of a ditch. The conclusion, therefore, is, that the cross must belong to the great grandfather; and it does so; and is received with a pleasure amounting to suffering. Meanwhile a great change has taken place in the love affair with the landlady. Among the heroes who have come into the village is a mighty little drummer (Miss POOLE), who is eight years of age, and fights duels: at least he proposes to fight one with another drummer (Master RICHARDSON) who says that the drum-major (Mr BENSON HILL), is not his father. The drum-major pacifying the little Hector, whom he is very fond of, confesses that he is not his father. He picked him up, during some military devastation, from the side of a dead mother. The mother, however, is not dead, for she turns out to have been no other than Madame La Ronde. The regiment is about to quit the village, and a dilemma ensues between the inability of the mother to part with her child, and the disconsolateness of the drum-major at leaving him. The little boy, whose wits equal his valour, and who drinks brandy, suddenly cries out that he has found a remedy for the evil, and both asking him what it is, he claps his hands and cries out, "You must marry." The drum-major apologizes, with a gallant modesty, to Madame La Ronde, for the child's indiscretion: Madame is equally distressed, and out of a like consideration for the drum-major's feelings. In short, good-nature, perplexity, reasonableness, and a mature understanding on both sides, bring the affair to a conclusion, which the genial hostess confesses to be a little abrupt, but natural. The rejected lover gets into a passion, which he satisfies by certain caperings, and kicks at the air. The duel between his son and the gardener is postponed under all the circumstances, evidently sine die; and the piece concludes with the decoration of the great grandfather in his new honours, and a chorus of the soldiers to his praise.

We have not been more agreeably or equably entertained for a long time, than with this piece. We augured well of it, from seeing such a good cast in the playbill; for though DOWTON has not much to do, it is desirable to see as many parts as possible filled up with good actors and; we need not add, that what little he has to do, he does well. So do all the rest. We have praise to give them, all and every one. LISTON is good; HARLEY is good; Mr BLAND makes a very proper, new captain; Mr BENSON HILL hits the matter to a nicety in making the drum-major's gentlemanly apology to his fair hostess; Mrs WAYLETT makes an attractive niece of a landlady; Mrs ORGER is always excellent in natural and good-humoured characters, without artficial refinement; little Miss POOLE encreases every day her promise of being no ordinary actress, and makes a capital little drummer, full of tack and smartness, yet not coarse; the very beau-ideal of an infant gallant; and Mr FARREN'S "old, old man" is above praise. The lumpish inability of his legs, the spareness of the rest of his body, the withered inefficiency of his voice and face, the pardonable self-love and little deciding nods of heads retained by extreme old-age, and lastly, the almost inaudible, but on that account highly real and touching manner, in which he sang his songs, are all admirable, perhaps a little too much so for the perfect pleasure of the beholders. We agree with the critic in the Spectator, in thinking that in passages, at least, if not altogether, his performance was "painfully natural."

We cannot say much for the music by Mr LEE. It is agreeable, but wants novelty, and leaves no impression. There is nothing in it so good as his 'Quivering Aspens,' and his 'Away to the Mountain.'

Drury Lane is fortunate in its new pieces. The present one, we doubt not, will have a run, alternately with the Tragedy of the Pledge.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

TUESDAY, APRIL 19, 1831.

SUCCESS OF PERIODICALS.

It was said the other day, in a weekly paper, that the best way to obtain a sale for a critical journal, was to praise everything. The journal, it was stated, thus got quoted and used by the booksellers, and a good sale was the consequence. Undoubtedly the frequent mention of a journal in any way is of use to it, and favourable reviews will be quoted in preference to others. But the critic would make a sad mistake, who should go upon this ground of success at the present moment. It was otherwise when the system alluded to first began,—we mean the system of laudation upon a trading principle. Party criticism had run so high, that everybody began to doubt both the praise and the blame of the cleverest reviews: it was discerned that the bookselling proprietors of those reviews had benefitted by the partizanship: their brethren set up periodical publications of their own, in self-defence: the public, disgusted with the previous unfairness, were seduced by the fairer pretences which were then made: booksellers and authors gradually came to play into one another's hands: and hence arose what may be styled the accommodating system of criticism, which consisted in giving a good word to all the connexions of the reigning parties, and being as iniquitously bitter or timidly silent upon writers, who were out of the pale of wordly influence.

In one or two journals, this accommodating system still flourishes, with more or less of the other qualifications; and doubtless great and preposterous use is still made of their criticisms, together with those of newspaper puffs, which are the least honourable of all these delusions, inasmuch as they are directly paid for the imposition in money, and present themselves, to the thousands whom they delude, under no apparent circumstances connecting them with a suspicion of partiality.

And yet there is something to be said for the booksellers in all this; nor does the blame even of the newspaper puffing always lie where it might be supposed to do. In the latter case, the Editor very likely differs with the proprietor of the newspaper; or if he is part-proprietor, differs with him who has the principal voice in it. Perhaps it is a source of constant annoyance with him, and even of dispute. It might be said, that he should not connect himself with a paper under such circumstances: but perhaps the paper is bought over his head, by some proprietor less worthy than the last; or perhaps, it is in consequence of his honest exertions as an Editor, that he has attained to a part-proprietorship; and to throw up his interest in the paper, might be to encounter one of those martyrdoms of self-sacrifice and poverty, which even the honest men of this world are at least not in the habit of encouraging.

As to the booksellers, they would have been glad in the first instance, had there been no such thing as criticism. It was the severity of the critic that gave rise to the counter-system, and it was the mere commercial policy of tradesmen, pretending to be nothing but tradesmen, which increased it to such a height. When we talk of the iniquity of booksellers, we should talk of the iniquity of hosiers and tea-dealers; for all are traders alike. It is only by an accident that booksellers have become mixed up with those intellectual questions, with which they have really nothing more in common than the porters in their warehouses. A bookseller laughs at you, if you talk to him of independence, or self-sacrifice, or anything but money-getting: and why should he not? He has been taught no better. He has been taught by a tradesman, and a tradesman he remains. To suppose even that he reads the books that he publishes, is a fancy about as sensible as that of the little boys, who think that the pastry-cooks are always eating tarts. The pastry-cook, through the poetical medium of his raspberry and gooseberry, sees only the amount at his banker's; and 'tis the same with the bookseller, let him publish the "sweetest" of poetrys. An exception once in a century proves nothing. We speak of what is emphatically called "The Trade."

Now the present commercial state of literature, is, we confess, a provoking one; and there is nothing more provoking about it, than to see authors helping booksellers in their impositions upon the public. The bookseller has been taught to think the imposition "just and necessary;" as the traders in coalitions are taught to think their wars; but it seems hard that authorship should become a party to the abuse. Nevertheless, it would be easy to shew, that many of our authors and existing critics are almost as illiterate and as mere tradesmen as the booksellers; and this, not because they have deserted their natural call, but because they have obeyed it, and were never intended for anything better than fellow-workers commercial. The present commercial state of the press, as far as it still exists, (for we look upon it as having received a great blow, in common with many other abuses that little suspect it, from the extraordinary events in the political world), has not been an unnatural, but a natural state; and, as far as it promises a condition of things very different, not an undesirable one; for it simply originates in the diffusion of knowledge, and the thirst for it excited among all classes. It has sometimes been a matter of provoking surprise, that writers who would not have been listened to in the times of Pope and Swift, beyond the sphere of Grub street, or known to these times but for the Dunciad, should have re-appeared among us as influential critics. But the matter is easily explained, when we consider the enormous multitude of new and uninformed readers, and how natural it is, even on a principle of self-love, that they should suffer themselves to be directed by men so little above their own standard. They are not unwilling to read a better, provided his style is amusing, and his thoughts not too far above them; but the other man meets them, at once, with a ready-made fitness; he is loud, he is industrious, he has the vivacity, if not of wit, yet of an ignorant confidence; some bookseller furnishes him with money to trumpet himself; he trumpets the bookseller; and it is the fault of the dunce's pretences to company and champaigne, if he does not ride in his carriage.

Among other proofs, however, that this state of a vulgar but influential part of the press, is a transitary one, is the fact that it sprang up in illiberal times, and in connexion with illiberal opinions. And we believe it can last long in no other; for it is the nature of liberal opinion to liberalize even its conventional advocates, and in despite of the tendencies they would have had under another system. But more of this presently. What we meant to say was, that although the journals alluded to, commenced a system of panegyric in behalf of their employers, and maintained it for the common benefit of those who would in any way subserve to them, it was accompanied by great deference to the then existing opinions in church and state, and a due intolerance towards those who differed with them. In other words, the praise would not have done, without the conventional deference; and even now, when better opinions have given the laudatory tendency a better character, we are no less certain, that a journal set up upon a panegyrical principle, would in vain think to succeed upon the strength of it. There are three things that are necessary to secure success to a journal,—money to make it known; industry, in order to lose no good that it acquires; and such a set of opinions as shall alienate no considerable body of men. Talents alone, with industry, may give a journal partial success; industry without talents, shall give it greater, if it has the other advantages; scandal may give it without either, provided it consent to be infamous: but what gives the greatest of all, is the union of money, industry, and talents, not with a system of indiscriminate panegyric, but with a thick and thin support of reigning opinions, and as violent an abuse of their opponents. Praise may assist to act the part of advertisements, and will be more or less successful for a time, in proportion as it pleases the booksellers: but to please any class of men finally, and to the greatest purpose, you must please them after the fashion they like best; and as the booksellers are but a speck in number compared with the community, lasting success with the latter can only be secured by reflecting the flower of their opinions in the most agreeable manner. Writers whose consciences lead them to have opinions of their own, and will allow them to express nothing at variance with those opinions, may succeed in the smaller circles they influence, and their success may be sufficient to themselves, accompanied with the sense they may entertain of their honour and usefulness: but this is not the question before us.

We are conscious ourselves of a tendency to the laudatory side, yet we certainly look for no success from it, equal to that which might be obtained without. Our tendency itself, we may venture to say, is of a description wholly unmercenary, otherwise we should not be silent about many books that are sent us, and which have obtained no mean praise from critics that have been severer than we upon works that we have passed over. The tendency to praise, like any other, may arise from various causes; and the truth is, that as we are of a temperament inclined to like rather than to dislike, and are really more pleased than otherwise with the greater number of publications, so we are of opinion that publications in general, even though of fugitive merit, deserve to be treated far more indulgently than otherwise,—to have their good brought forward, if they contain any, and their defects put aside as lightly as possible, as matters of no importance if we do not make them so. What we want is something good, not something ill. If there be any good, let us get it. If there be nothing but ill, or dullness, it will die of itself; the sooner for our letting it alone. Should the ill, indeed, consist of clever sophistications, then we may combat it, and perhaps in the discussion, what seemed to us ill may turn out to be good. But how seldom do books of this doubtful character come before us? We confess that our criticism was not always so good-natured as it is now. In our youth, we were bitten with an admiration of wits and satirists, and not having tasted of the evils of men, we fancied that in being severe we should only shew our wit, to our own classical honour, and the discomfiture of so many men made of paper and ink; for no more substantial in our eyes did the objects of our petulant vanity appear at that time. We imagined ourselves future Boileaus and Juvenals, and took it in our head that everybody who differed with us was no better than a Cotin or a Codrus. The criticism directed against ourselves, the same vanity rendered harmless to us. In the course of a few years, reflection and suffering began to make us feel it more: the implication of others and their fortunes, rendered it bitter to us; the great cause of freedom and liberality, for which we had still occasion to contend, we found to be the only thing worth contending for,—the only struggle in which we could warrant ourselves either in giving or receiving blows; and hence we were brought round to the better spirit of our earliest days, when our unconscious object was to be happy with as many as we could, and we knew of no hostility but in standing by a friend against his oppressor. On this oldest and happiest ground of our experience, loving as much as we did then, hating as little, and strong to abide by a principle as pertinaciously, we have again set up our tents, like persons returned home from a long voyage, whose bitterest merchandise is yet spices and gums; and here we are contented to be thought childish, by those who have more experience than we, satisfied that they will criticise us in a different spirit from those who have less. We therefore wish to criticise others, in as uncritical a spirit of the old fashion as we can. We discover what good we are able; we like, and profess to like, good-nature and sprightliness, for its own sake, even if an author should possess little more: we will give him credit for it, and bring him into company, as we would the pleasant face of a friend, and because, among other truths, it is true that such qualities are pleasant for their own sakes, or ought to be where they are not. The same love of truth will hinder us from saying that an author has qualities which he has not, or that a bad poem is a good one. Whenever we find fault, it is for something that looks like ill-nature, or a lie.

The truth is, that criticism itself, for the most part, is a nuisance, and an impertinence: and no good-natured, reflecting men would be critics, if it were not that there are worse. It would be better if there were no criticism on books at all; for the bad ones would die of themselves, and the good ones would have a better chance of making their way. Critics, for the most part, are not of the first order of literati, otherwise they would be better occupied: they are often of the very worst order, and therefore are perniciously occupied. Who would attend to the opinions of the critics that have flourished for the last thirty years, if their names had been known? And what mistakes have not they all made, the worst and the best?

Our design in the Tatler is to give as many entertaining extracts from books as we can find, to be honest but not ill-natured critics, and to furnish the reader with such glimpses into the regions of pleasant and improving thoughts as experience may have helped us to. As there are "more things in heaven and earth" than are dreamt of in most philosophies, so there are more truths than lie on the surface of common sense or conversational polish; and the more we become acquainted with these, the more we love truth in its largest sense, and despise falsehood in any. Our object next to the one we have earned a right to attend to, is to assist in keeping humanity in heart and hope for the diviner times, which liberality is producing.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

DELIGHTS.

Rock'd on the salt deep
Into a sunny sleep,
And a dream sublime
Of the flow of Time,
Whose billows without number
Bear all things in a slumber
Into eternity,
As we
Over the glowing sea
Are wafted sleepingly:

Pillow'd, with leaves and stars above us,
Upon hearts that love us;
Clasp'd and folden
In arms and eyes,
Till from full-cupp'd pleasure's brink
Into a trance we sink,
With visions golden
Peopling the shadow of our ecstacies—
Redeeming sleep from death,
And doubling every joy that perisheth:

Upon an oaken bough
In the fierce wind swinging,
Shouting to earth below,
To the clouds on high
And the birds that round us fly
Rejoicingly,
Words of a clear-tongued poet's singing,
Lofty flights of madness winging:
These are delights divine—
They have been mine.

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

— These Types are useful things, but now and then they will get awry. A single letter sometimes,—"haud inexperti loquimur,"—makes sad mischief. An article before us, in a Philadelphia paper, which was intended for a neat notice of a poem, contains the following odoriferous sentence:—"But the extracts abound with sweat and touching poetry"—wherein we see that the alteration of one letter hath robbed the expression of half its e's and all its sweetness.—New York Gazette.

A Royal Hunting Party.—The game had been all collected on the preceding day, and when we arrived, the exalted personages for whom the amusement was destined, were seated in a vast space prepared for the purpose, behind which was an amphitheatre for the company invited by the court. Each hunter was attended by four pages, who loaded the guns for them; and behind the pages, piqueurs armed with lances guarded against any possibility of danger. At a given signal the batteurs drew together, and at the same moment there issued, from the various outlets of the woods, a countless number of wild boars, deer, hares, and other kinds of game, which were shot by the privileged sportsmen. The sport was kept up until the number of animals killed amounted to several thousands. My friends and I were stationed at a little distance from the Empress of Austria. She always aimed at hares, or some small kind of game, and rarely missed her mark! On our return home, Ypsilanti expressed himself surprised at the extraordinary dexterity of the Empress. "Doubtless," observed I, "she takes her aim with wonderful accuracy; but in the arsenal at Stockholm I have seen a carbine, with which, it is affirmed, Queen Christina amused herself by shooting flies in her chamber! Her Majesty, it is said, was an excellent markswoman, and never missed her aim! This, it must be confessed, was a novel sort of sporting."—"Yes," added the Count de Witt; "but that innocent amusement was very different from her sanguinary revenge on Monaldechi at Fontainebleau, the cause of which has never been accurately ascertained."—Journal of a Nobleman.—[The Count de Witt ill deserved his name, if he did not see that the "innocent amusement" of shooting flies was quite cause enough for any "sanguinary revenge" on the part of the person who indulged in it.]

— A meteor was seen a few days since at Fayetteville, N. C., which shed a blaze of light. It passed over the town between 12 and 1 o'clock, and a loud explosion was heard at the time. During the eclipse there the thermometer fell rapidly; and the weather became so very cold, that water thrown up into the air froze almost immediately. Several stars were distinctly visible. The eclipse was not annular.—American Paper.

ANECDOTE OF A KAMTSCHATKAN BEAR.—The following anecdote evinces the hardihood of the bears. Fish, which forms their chief nourishment, and which they procure for themselves from the rivers, was last year excessively scarce. A great famine consequently existed among them, and instead of retiring to their dens, they wandered about the whole winter through, even in the streets of St Peter and St Paul. One of them finding the outer gate of a house open, entered, and the gate accidentally closed after him. The woman of the house had just placed a large tea-machine,* full of boiling water. in the court, the bear smelt to it, and burned his nose; provoked at the pain, he vented all his fury upon the kettle, folded his fore-paws round it, pressed it with his whole strength against his breast to crush it, and burnt himself, of course, still more and more. The horrible growl which rage and pain forced from him, brought all the inhabitants of the house and neighbourhood to the spot, and poor bruin was soon despatched by shots from the windows. He has, however, immortalized his memory, and become a proverb among the town's-people, for when any one injures himself by his own violence, they call him "the bear with the tea-kettle."—Kotzebue's New Voyage Round the World, in 1823, &c.

METHOD OF CONVERSION IN THE MISSIONS IN CALIFORNIA.—He described to us their method of conversion. The monks, he said, send dragoons into the mountains to catch the free heathens, that they may convert them into Christian slaves. For this species of chase, the huntsman is provided with a strong leathern noose fastened to his saddle, long enough to throw to a great distance, and acquires such dexterity in the practice, as seldom to miss his aim. As soon as he perceives a troop of Indians, he throws his noose over one of them before he has time to defend himself, then setting spurs to his horse, rides back to his mission with his prisoner, and is fortunate if he bring them there alive. I can myself bear witness to the skill and boldness of the dragoons, in the management of their horses, and in the use of the noose, with which two or three of them, in conjunction, will catch even bears and wild bulls; a single man is sufficient to capture an Indian.—Kotzebue's New Voyage Round the World, in 1823, &c.

OTAHEITAN COSTUME.—It is almost impossible for an European seeing them (the Otaheitans,) for the first time in their Sunday attire, to refrain from laughter. The high value which they set on clothes of our manufacture, has already been remarked; they are more proud of possessing them than are our ladies of diamonds and Persian shawls, or our gentlemen of stars and garters. As they know nothing of our fashions, they pay no sort of attention to the art; and even age and wear do not diminish their estimation of their attire; a ripped out seam or a hole, is no drawback in the elegance of the article. These clothes, which are brought to Otaheite by merchant ships, are purchased at a rag market, and sold here at an enormous profit. The Otaheitan therefore, finding a complete suit of clothes very expensive, contents himself with a single garment, whoever can obtain an English military coat, or even a plain one, goes about with the rest of his body naked, except the universally-worn girdle; the happy owner of a waistcoat or a pair of trowsers, thinks his wardrobe amply furnished. Some have nothing more than a shirt, and others as much oppressed by the heat, under a heavy cloth mantle, as they would be in a Russian bath, are far too vain of their finery to lay it aside. Shoes, boots, or stockings are rarely met with, and the coats mostly too tight and too short, make the oddest appearance imaginable; many of their wearers can hardly move their arms, and are forced to stretch them out like the sails of a windmill, while their elbows, curious to see the world, peep through slits in the seams. Let any one imagine such an assembly, perfectly satisfied of the propriety of their costume, and to complete the effect, wearing an ultra-serious expression of countenance, and he will easily believe that it was impossible to be very devout in their presence. The attire of the females, though not quite so absurd, was by no means picturesque; some wore white or striped men's shirts, which did not conceal their knees, and others were wrapped in sheets. Their hair was cut quite close to the roots, according to a fashion introduced by the Missionaries, and their heads covered by little European chip hats of a most tasteless form, and decorated with ribbons and flowers made in Otaheite. But the most valuable article of dress was a coloured gown, an indubitable sign of the possessor's opulence, and the object of her unbounded vanity. * * * * * During a visit, the young princess (the king's sister) had found an opportunity to bargain with a sailor for a sheet; having secured this treasure, she ran with it upon deck, in the most extravagant joy, viewed it over and over with delight, and formed it into a really very becoming drapery. She appeared quite conscious of her increased attractions in this attire, leaped about in the most sprightly manner, and called on all the persons of the Court to admire her. In short, a young European lady on first decorating herself with the most costly Persian shawl, would not have been so happy as this young princess dressed in the sailor's sheet.—Kotzebue's New Voyage Round the World.

ADELPHI.

MESSIEURS MATHEWS and YATES commenced their entertainment for the season last night;—we regret to say, not with their usual success. They began admirably; got poor towards the middle (for want of stuff in the writing to act upon); and before the curtain dropped, were assailed with objections unusual to the ears of these performers, and painful to old play-goers to hear.

The entertainments were divided into three parts. Mr MATHEWS had the first part to himself, and succeeded as of old. It consisted of the customary whimsicalities, anecdotes, and traits of character, illustrated with his usual various and surpassing mimicry. One of his portraits was a Mr Littlemiff, who hates people for singing under his windows, being postmen with bells, &c. not so much on account of what they do, but because they have "a right to do it." Another is an Irishman, accompanied with an imitation of the crowding, noise, and oratory of a Dublin court of law (all admirable,—from the eternal babble of the man in the witness-box, up through the varieties of blandness, indifference, and florid bluster in the Counsel, to the silence-creating tones, the spectacled remonstrances, and neutralizing summing up, of the Judge.) A third exhibition, very ludicrous, was that of a fantastic lover of the stage, who brings forward a little boy dressed up as Norval; and speaks the famous speech for him, substituting the words "this young gentleman" for the personal pronouns referring to himself.—"Ladies and gentlemen, allow me to introduce to you this young gentleman,

> Whose name is Norval. On the Grampian hills
> His father feeds his flocks, a frugal swain,
> Whose constant care was to keep this young gentleman > at home
> His only son. But the young gentleman had heard > of arms,
> And much he longed to join the battle field.
> Therefore, one evening, when the moon had risen,
> Round as this young gentleman's shield."

The odd effect of this whim was completed by the round, unwitting look of the boy's face, who stood as unmoved all the while as if he was stupid, and produced an impression of his really being so.

The second part consisted of a little mimic drama, performed all by Mr YATES, who appeared at various times in the character of a Neapolitan Hostess, an Alderman, an ogling Admiral, an Anglo-Italian Dancer, a deformed Dillettante, in love with handsome proportions, a handsome bar-maid in love with everything operatic, a retired dandy, and the famous Fra Diavolo. All these gentlemen, but the last, are in love with the bar-maid; the bar-maid is enamoured of Jacksonnini the dancer; and Fra Diavolo is bent on robbing the Alderman. A series of exits and entrances in different characters takes place accordingly; the dancer succeeds beyond them all; and the house is ultimately set on fire, to enable the piece to end with proper vivacity. It wanted substance and dialogue, and was unusually barren of jokes. It is a pity that Mr YATES, in justice to himself, had not provided something better. In the character of the Dandy, he introduced a string of BRUMMELL'S bon mots; but for want of a cue given to the audience, perhaps for want of an audience from the West End, nobody seemed to understand them. The best thing was the theatrical sighing and dying of the handsome (videlicet, horse godmother) bar-maid, her affected tripping, and other mimicries of the female stage manner. And the dancing of Jacksonnini was good. Some of Mr YATES's rapid changes of dress were also admired; bnt upon the whole, he acted to a house in a state of extraordinary silence. Words and points were deplorably wanting.

This was unfortunately too much the case with the Third Part, which consisted of another attempt at a drama got up between Mr YATES and MATHEWS, in which they performed the parts of a cobler, a widow, an Irishman and his servant, a Quakeress, a negro and a watchman. It was a pity to see such good mimicry thrown away, for want of some stuff in the writing. The audience became so tired that many went away before it was half over, and others at length hissed and cried "off! off!" a manifestation of contempt, however, which the major part instantly drowned with their applause, out of a natural sympathy with old favourites in so unusual a position. Nevertheless, this, though repeated, did not enable the piece to go comfortably to a conclusion. The hisses returned; and the performers, happening to be on the stage together, wisely took the opportunity of making their obedience, and letting the curtain fall.

We would advise them, if possible, to halt the entertainments at once, and have the second and third parts made entirely new. Their failure is probably owing to the confidence which such performers naturally put in their mimicry, and the notion that, by their relishing style alone, they can pepper an indifferent dish up to the palates of their visitors. But this is a mistake. They are sensible men; and cannot do better than rectify it at once. ☞

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

MADCAP to-morrow.

M. V. C. received with many thanks, as will be otherwise acknowledged.

We congratulate our friend "W" on the success and the handsomeness of his revenge. We flatter ourselves however, that nobody by and by will agree with us more on the point he alludes to, than himself; as indeed he already confesses a tendency to do.

AGNES BERNAUER.

STRAUBING is a town of Lower Bavaria, situated on an arm of the Danube, twenty-five miles south east of Ratisbon. It is conjectured to have been the Serviodurum Augusti of the Romans; and the name of Straubinga first occurs in an instrument dated A.D. 902. From the possession of Otto, Bishop of Augsburg, it became a fief annexed to the cathedral of that city, by which it was governed by an officer called a Vice Dom; but in the beginning of the thirteenth century the new town of Straubing was built, and the old city reannexed to the duchy of Bavaria. In 1319 it was captured by the Austrians; and in 1332 was besieged by Louis the Bavarian for the space of a month, and eventually taken by storm. The castle of Straubing on the Danube was built in 1356, by his son by Matilda of Lancaster. The city has been twice destroyed by fire, but at present retains a cheerful and prosperous air.

In a small chapel in the churchyard of St. Peter's, in the Altstadt or old town, is a tablet of red marble, surmounted by a female effigy, and surrounded by an inscription to the memory of Agnes Bernauer; a victim to the domestic tyranny of the middle ages, under circumstances of highly romantic interest.

Albert, only son to Duke Ernest of Bavaria, was one of the most accomplished and heroic princes of his time. By the intervention of his family he was betrothed to the Countess Elizabeth of Wirtemburg, whose affections being otherwise engaged, she eloped previous to the signature of the contract of marriage, with the young Count of Werdenberg. This mortifying intelligence was conveyed to Albert at the moment he was presiding at a tournament given by the city of Augsburg in commemoration of his approaching nuptials; but it failed to exasperate the forsaken bridegroom. He had been already captivated by the extreme beauty of Agnes Bernauer, a damsel who happened to grace the festival with her presence.

This beautiful girl was the daughter of a bath-keeper of Augsburg; and was distinguished in the city by the appellation of "The Angel," in honour of the virtues by which the charms of her person were enhanced. Notwithstanding the degradation of her birth, Prince Albert did not hesitate to acknowledge his attachment, and their nuptials were shortly afterwards privately celebrated at his castle at Vohberg. The Duke of Bavaria soon penetrated the mystery, and prepared to visit the offence with the greatest severity. He required his son to sign a deed of divorce, that he might immediately espouse the daughter of Duke Eric of Brunswick; and on the steadfast refusal of Albert, proceeded to further acts of rigour.

The young prince having been soon afterwards denied admittance to a tournament in Ratisbon on the plea of being degraded from his rank by a dishonourable alliance, rode into the lists in defiance of all opposition, and boldly declared Agnes Bernauer his lawful wife; after which, he conducted her with much pomp and ceremony to his palace at Straubing. But the court of Munich was indefatigable in its malicious persecution of the youthful couple, and left no effort unattempted to work the ruin of the unfortunate Agnes. Of the whole ducal family, William, the brother of Ernest and uncle of Albert, having alone given tokens of an inclination to become her protector, she was accused by the Duke of Bavaria of having administered poison to a sickly child, the only son of her generous patron. Duke William was not misled by this vile misrepresentation; but dying shortly afterwards, the unfortunate Agnes was left without a friend.

During the temporary absence of Prince Albert in the administration of his estates, the authorities of Straubing, under the influence of the Duke of Bavaria, caused her to be arrested and torn from the palace, on some frivolous pretext; and when Agnes, resenting with indignation this insolent usage, presumed to impeach their authority over the wife of their prince, the judges declared her contumacy to be an act of high treason. She was condemned to death; and amid the lamentations of the populace, was precipitated over the bridge into the Danube. The efforts of the struggling victim succeeded in withdrawing one of her feet from the cords by which she was bound, when shrieking for help and mercy, she attempted to swim towards the shore; but just as she effected a landing, a wretch employed by the iniquitous tribunal entangled a hooked pole in her long hair, and dragging her back into the river, kept her under water till she expired. This cruel assassination occurred on the 12th of October 1436, as recorded on her monument.

On his return to Straubing, the rage of the injured husband knew no bounds. He flew to Ingoldstadt, entered into an alliance with Louis the Bearded, the inveterate enemy of the reigning Duke of Bavaria, and returned to his native country at the head of a hostile army; nor could his indignation be pacified till the Emperor Sigismond effected a reconciliation between the father and son. The old duke, tormented by remorse, was induced to give public tokens of his repentance by founding a perpetual mass for the soul of the murdered Agnes Bernauer.—Vol. II. pp. 257—260.

HUGO GROTIUS, THE CELEBRATED PATRIOT AND PHILOSOPHER.

GORCUM, a town of the United Provinces, situated at the junction of the rivers Meuse and Wahal, on the road from Nimeguen to Rotterdam, derives its celebrity from having been the retreat of the learned Grotius, after his escape from the neighbouring castle of Loevenstein.

Hugo Grotius, or De Groot, was born in 1583, the son of a burgomaster of Delft; and after distinguishing himself by precocity of talent at the schools of the Hague and Leyden, and attracting the notice of Joseph Scaliger and other eminent scholars, he accompanied the embassy of Count Justin of Nassau and the Grand Pensionary Barnevelt, to Paris. Although scarcely more than fifteen years of age, he was complimented by the University with a doctor's degree; and by Henri IV with the gift of his portrait and a gold chain. At seventeen he pleaded and gained his first cause in the civil court of Delft; and before his countrymen had surmounted their amazement at his eloquence and learning, he increased their surprise by the production of several works of polite literature. At the age of twenty, he was appointed historiographer to the States of Holland.

Ten years afterwards, Hugo Grotius, whose name had now become eminent for the brilliancy and variety of his attainments, was elected Pensionary of Rotterdam, and obtained a seat in the States-general. His abilities and legal acquirements were employed for the benefit of his country, in the settlement of certain disputes between the Dutch and English, relative to the whale-fisheries of the northern seas; but unfortunately about this period there arose schisms in the Protestant church, in which Grotius, as one of the most learned and venerated scholars of the age, was required to take an active part.

Having publicly embraced the tenets of Arminius,—a Leyden professor of divinity, who warmly advocated the free agency of mankind, in opposition to the doctrines of Calvin—the Pensionary of Rotterdam—(who, in a mission from the States-general to the court of Great Britain, had received the qualified sanction of King James and his Bishops to the cause of Arminianism) was employed, on his return to Holland, to draw up an edict on the part of the States, calculated to pacify the religious dissensions now beginning to agitate that country.

Unfortunately, this political measure proved peculiarly injurious to the cause. The Gomarists, or opponents of the Arminian sect, were so disgusted by the partiality displayed by the States-general, in their manifesto, towards the advocates of free agency and general toleration, that they broke out into fresh riot; and Barnevelt, the Grand Pensionary, having proposed to the States a levy of troops for the suppression of the disturbances, and obtained a decree to that effect, the cities of Dort and Amsterdam, which were chiefly inhabited by Gomarists, affected to regard these measures as a declaration of war; while Prince Maurice of Nassau, resenting as Governor-General this independent measure on the part of the States, conceived an implacable enmity against its instigators, Barnevelt and Grotius.

The States-general, sincerely desirous of appeasing these national irritations, sent Grotius to Amsterdam to plead the cause of toleration. But neither his eloquence, nor the deputation of which he was he was the head, were able to alter the sentiments of the town council, which declared its intention to convoke a National Synod; while Prince Maurice, enraged by the levy of the militia, marched into the proviuce of Gueldres, subdued it, and proceeded towards Utrecht. The States of Holland, on their part, despatched thither Hugo Grotius, and Hoogarbetz the Pensionary of Leyden, to prepare for its defence. But their efforts against Maurice proved ineffectual; and they were made prisoners, and sent to the castle of the Hague, where Barnevelt was confined.

Digitized by Google

The States finding resistance unavailing, now consented to the opening of the National Synod; which took place at Dort, Nov. 15, 1618, and was attended by commissioners from England, France, Saxony, and several other European kingdoms. It consisted of fourteen Arminian members, and seventy Gomarists, or contra-remonstrants, to whom the celebrated Heinsius acted as secretary; and, after a variety of learned arguments on both sides, the synod was closed on the 29th of May 1619, having passed a formal condemnation upon the five articles of the Arminian belief. Two months afterwards, the sentence was ratified by the States-general; and such were the severities exercised against the heretics, that to avoid persecution, the majority of the Arminians or Remonstrants, emigrated to France, Holstein, or Antwerp.

In the mean time, the three prisoners, Barnevelt, Grotius, and Hoogarbetz, were removed from the Hague to the fortress of Loevenstein; twenty-six commissioners were appointed for their trial; and, in spite of the able and pathetic defence of the Grand Pensionary—in which he proved that his accuser, Prince Maurice of Nassau, was indebted to him for the Stadtholderate—he was condemned to death, as a disturber of the tranquillity of the republic, and a counsellor of schemes hostile to its welfare. Several princes of the continent expressed the greatest dissatisfaction at this decision, and remonstrated, through their ambassadors, with the states: the King of France, moreover, despatched an ambassador extraordinary to advocate the cause of a man whose merits had been long known to him:—but the influence of Prince Maurice proved permanent.

Barnevelt, who was executed on a scaffold fronting the palace of the Stadtholder at the Hague, died asserting his martyrdom in defence of the rights and liberties of his native country; and it is said that his enemy, the prince, surveyed the execution through a glass, and that the populace eagerly sought and treasured the sand wet with the blood of their champion. Towards the close of his life, however, the ill-success of Prince Maurice against Spinola, at the siege of Breda, brought on a delirious fever; and he was frequently heard to exclaim in his dying moments, "Take away that bloody head; remove Barnevelt from my side." His death was embittered by the severest remorse!

Meanwhile the two friends and fellow prisoners of the unfortunate Grand Pensionary were saved from participation in his fate, and condemned to perpetual imprisonment and confiscation of their estates. On the 6th of June 1619, Grotius was conveyed to the fortress of Loevenstein, near Gorcum—an unhealthy spot at the point of an island formed by the Meuse. A shilling per day was parsimoniously allotted for his maintenance: but his wife, Mary Reygersburg, a lady of an illustrious family in Zealand, not only agreed to provide for his necessities, but insisted on sharing his captivity. Her request was granted, upon condition that she should in every respect participate in the consequences of his sentence;—and for some time their imprisonment was of the most rigid nature. At length she was allowed to quit the castle for a few hours in the course of the week; a relaxation which soon induced her to project the escape of her husband.

Having formed an intimate acquaintance with the family of the commandant of Gorcum, she took occasion to lament, in their presence, the intense application of Grotius to his studies; and even circulated a report that he had incurred a fit of illness by his sedentary habits. She was aware that the chest containing the exchange of his books and linen, which had been at first rigorously examined by the guards, in the course of twenty months became less actively searched, and was finally suffered to pass to its destination without inquiry, and she now stated her intention of taking away his books, and restoring them to the persons in Gorcum, from whom they had been borrowed. The trunk was usually sent in a boat from the fortress to the town: and holes having been bored in it for the admission of air, she intrusted the maid-servant and valet of Grotius with the secret, and prevailed upon her husband to conceal himself in the chest—which was passed with some slight difficulty into the ferry-boat, and removed from the waterside to Gorcum upon a horse-sledge. The maid servant, who directed the undertaking, stated that this case required especial care, from being filled with glass; and succeeded in causing it to be deposited in the house of one Bazelaer, an Arminian friend of her master, resident in the town, who received him with open arms.

Grotius, by the advice of Bazelaer, having disguised himself as a mason, quitted the house with a rule and trowel in his hand; and reached the market-place in safety, where a boat had been previously engaged for his reception, in which he soon reached Vervic in Brabant, and was restored to liberty and security.

His wife, as soon as she was satisfied by the return of the servant of their success, apprized the commandant of the escape of his prisoner, and was immediately condemned to a rigorous confinement for her share in the plot. But a decree of the States-general shortly afterwards restored her to liberty; permitting her to quit the castle of Leovenstein with all her property, and to rejoin her husband.

From Vervic, Grotius and his family proceeded to Antwerp; and having finally taken up his abode in Paris, he addressed an apology to the States-general, which provoked their indignation to such a degree, that the paper and its author were proscribed, and all persons condemned to death in whose possession it might be found. Thus exiled, he was honoured by overtures of protection by Spain, Poland, Denmark, and Holstein; but inclining towards Gustavus of Sweden, Grotius formed a friendship with Chancellor Oxenstiern, and was eventually appointed Counsellor to the Queen, and her ambassador to the court of France—where he upheld the rights and distinctions of that honourable post for a period of ten years.

Recalled at length, by his own desire, from his appointment, he had frequent and friendly interviews with Queen Christina, who would willingly have persuaded him to naturalize himself in Sweden: but Grotius asserted that the delicacy of his wife's health would not permit him to settle in so cold a country. After receiving some costly presents in plate and money from the queen, he embarked for Lubeck, and was driven by a storm upon the coast of Pomerania, near Dantzig, which he quitted for Lubeck, in an open post-waggon; and, in consequence of the inclemency of the weather, this great man was attacked by a severe ague, and died at Rostock, on the road, after an illness of three days. His body was embalmed, and interred in the vault of his ancestors at Delft.

Two medals were struck in honour of Hugo Grotius; and he left behind him the reputation of the most learned and able jurisconsult of his age. His sufferings in the cause of religious liberty have shed a halo of peculiar sanctity around his memory.—Vol. I. pp. 12—21.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

HYMN TO GOD.

In thy large Temple, the blue depth of space,
And on the Altar of thy quiet fields
(Fit shrine to grace the beauty of thy love)
Great Spirit! with earnest cheerfulness I place
This off'ring, which a grateful heart now yields.—
For all those high and gracious thoughts that rove
O'er all thy works; for all the rare delights
Of eye and ear—harmonious forms, and strains
Of deepest breath; for this ensuing Spring,
With all its tender leaves and blossoming,
And dainty smells that steam from dropping rains;
For sunny days, and silent, shining nights;
For youth, and mirth, and health—though dash'd with smarts,
As luscious creams are tinged with bitterness;
For Hope—sweet Hope! unconscious of alloy;
For peaceful thoughts, kind faces, loving hearts,
That suck out all the poison from distress:
For all these gifts I offer gratitude and joy. C.

A DILEMMA.

Which is the maiden I love best?
Twenty now are buzzing round me:—
Three in their milky arms have wound me;
One hath showered her black locks o'er me;
Ten are on the ground before me;
Casting forth such darts of blue,
That I'm pierced through and through.
Bacchus! Gods! what can I do?
Which must I love best?

Tell me—(ah! more gently take me,
Sweet one, in thy warm white arms!)
Tell me which will ne'er forsake me,
Through all life's ills and harms?
Is it she whose blood's retreating
From that forehead crowned with pride?
Is it she whose pulse is beating
Full against my unarm'd side?
What do all these looks betide?
Strong my doubts grow—strong—and stronger—
Quick! Give answer to my call!
If ye pause a moment longer,
I shall love them—ALL! MADCAP.

SUCCESSFUL ATTEMPT TO OBTAIN WATER IN THE DESERT BETWEEN SUEZ AND CAIRO.

Extract from the Malta Government Gazette, dated 16th March 1831:—

'We have been favoured with an interesting account of some successful attempts made by the energy and perseverance of Mr Samuel Briggs, of Alexandria, to find water in the Desert, between Suez and Cairo. This is not only an important discovery for the natives of the country, but will no doubt facilitate the intercourse with India by way of Egypt.

'The first experiments were made in the Valley of Kesche, where the workmen bored, in one instance, to the depth of 160 feet, through a fine sand-stone, mixed with clay, without finding any humidity; and in another place to the depth of 50 feet, principally through a rock composed of fragments of silex and jaspar, when they met with a hard rock which broke the instruments, and the attempt was consequently relinquished in that spot. Nothing discouraged, however, the operations were transferred to the Valley of Candelli. Here water has been found in a clayey stratum, at the depth of only 13 feet, where a well is already established, to which the Arabs come for their daily supply. Above the clay is a bed of calcareous sand-stone, five feet thick, through which the water filters; and in the stratum of clay three lateral galleries have been ingeniously struck to the extent of 12 or 14 feet, which not only serve to collect the water, but, together with a further continuation of the well, to the total depth of 21 feet, form a reservoir of 1,200 cubic feet of water. The whole is to be lined with stone and mortar, which will render it a work of perfect art; and what is most important is, that the water being found so near the surface, neither the labour of camels nor machinery will be required to draw it.

'Two other wells have been commenced in the same valley, with the same prospect of success. It is believed that, as the spot is only an hour, or an hour and a half's journey from the great chain of mountains which stretches across the Desert from the Nile to the Red Sea, the waters have thence their sourse.

'This enterprise has been projected by, and carried into execution at the sole expense of Mr Briggs. He has in his employ an able mineralogist, Mr Albert Ginsberg (a Swiss, we believe), who is still continuing his researches, and is confident of finding water, and establishing wells, at other points of the route. The practical artificers are two Englishmen, named Hancock and Wood. The place of their labours will most probably soon become stations or villages, where man and animal will not only be supplied with water, but with all other necessaries in their painful journeyings; and the names of the projector and executors of this work will be remembered with gratitude by all future travellers in this hitherto sterile desert.

'Above all, it is to be hoped that the enlightened Ruler of Egypt will not fail to appreciate the zeal and perseverance of Mr Briggs, the success of whose undertaking will tend greatly to facilitate the commerce and promote the prosperity of that country.'

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

The Saddle converted into a Parapluie.—When they (the Peons) are out on the plains, and a heavy rain is about to descend, they take off their clothes, and place them under the saddle; they then ride about stark naked, under a plentiful shower-bath, and after this is exhausted, they resume their dry clothes.—Beaumont's Buenos Ayres.

Seamless Boots.—The native Indians make boots from the hind legs of young horses. The skin is cut round in the middle of the thigh, and again about nine inches above the fetlock; it is then stripped off. The upper part forms the leg of the boot, the hock forms the heel, and the remainder covers the foot, leaving a hole at the end, through which they thrust the great toe. This boot is cleared of the hair, and drawn over the leg and foot while the skin is yet moist, to the shape of which it comforms itself, without any further trouble. The great toe alone they rest in the stirrup when riding, which from that use of it requires extraordinary strength, and stands apart from the others.—Beaumont's Buenos Ayres.

Wild Bees at Buenos Ayres.—Honey-bees are numerous near the rivers; their nests are of the consistence of a swallow's nest, about the size of a man's head, and are seen fixed to the branches of trees, at about twelve feet from the ground. * * * * The natives take the bees' nests by enveloping them in their ponchos, except the hole at which the bees enter; this they hold behind them, and running in the opposite direction to the wind, the bees, on sallying forth, are carried away from their enemy, who is out of their reach in a short time. The wild honey is not highly-flavoured, and the wax is softer than in Europe.—Beaumont's Buenos Ayres.

— In Forster's Encyclopædia of Natural Phœnomena, is a curious catalogue of names for every day in the year, "according to the phœnomena which happen on an average of years on each day." An English explanation is added to the few examples here given.

Feb. 15.—	Corvinidus - - -	Rooks build.
25.—	Ornithogamia - -	Birds pair.
March 5.—	Ranicoaxus - - -	Frogs croak.
12.—	Ulularia - - -	Owls hoot.
24.—	Bellidiflora - - -	Daisies flower.
25.—	Papilionifera - - -	Butterflies appear.
April 4.—	Cerasiflora - - -	Cherry blossoms.
12.—	Philomelicantus - -	Nightingales sing.
15.—	Chelidonophoria - -	Swallows arrive.

Saturn's New Moon.—A vulgar prejudice has prevailed, from time immemorial, in Sussex, that a Saturday's moon brings blowing and wet weather. By some accident this has proved very true for the last twenty years. To ascribe such a phœnomena to the occurrence of the new moon on the day specially dedicated to Saturn, must, of course, obviously appear superstitious; but there may be natural causes why the conjunction of the sun and moon at some such diurnal periods may, in the long run, turn out to be connected with rough weather; and these periods once falling on a Saturday, would for a long time continue to do so; hence may have arisen this vulgar notion. Old shepherds, gardeners, hunters, and men of education, have alike testified to the fact.—Forster's Natural Phœnomena.

Buenos Ayres Immortality.—Mr Beaumont, in his 'Travels in Buenos Ayres,' quotes a curious passage from Mr Secretary Nunez, who, according to the author, seems a little,—no, not a little,—given to exaggeration, boasting of certain large potatoes, large trees, and large grains of gold, of which no other person has any knowledge:—"The first quality of the air in this country produces an effect among the inhabitants, which is easily felt, but difficult to express—we call it a confidence of living. Several foreigners have told us that they have enjoyed that exquisite sensation; and the writer of the present article has compared it with another feeling diametrically opposite, which he experienced in some of the other unwholesome countries of America, where, on the contrary, was felt a mistrust of living, and an almost incessant notification of the necessity of dying. It would appear that the people of Buenos Ayres, as is the case with young persons, have no practical idea of death."—In ranking this country among the unwholesome ones of America, Mr Secretary Nunez refers, probably, to the moral effect of this vital air; meaning to say, that it is unwholesome for man to live without the fear of death before his eyes.

Vision of the Mole.—Does the mole see? Aristotle, and all the Greek philosophers, thought it blind. Galen, on the other hand, maintained that the mole saw. He affirmed that it has all the known means of sight. The question has been resumed in modern times. Naturalists have found the eye of the animal. It is very small—not larger than a millet seed; its colour is an ebony black; it is hard to the touch; and can scarcely be depressed by squeezing it between the fingers. Besides the eyelid which covers, it is protected by long hairs, which crossing each other, form a thick and strong bandage. Such an eye ought to be destined to see. But anatomists do not find the optic nerve. What use could an eye be of, deprived of a nerve, which in other animals transmits the visual sensations to the brain, which nevertheless exist?—Atlas.

ORCHESTRA AT THE HAYMARKET.

TO THE TATLER.

Sir,—Can any of your readers tell me the reason why the gentlemen of the band at the French Theatre do not play between the pieces till just before the performance is about to commence? Between the first play and the Vaudeville of 'Madame du Barry' I saw two people go away; and a third and fourth were about making their exit, after at least half-an-hour's patience, when the band struck up. The delay on the part of the performers is accounted for by the unusual attention necessary to arrive at that perfection of ugliness and powder characteristic of the costume of the reign of Louis the Fifteenth; but one of the uses of an orchestra is to fill up these gaps, and make us rather anticipate them with pleasure, than with horror. To people who are fond of music this is a serious privation; and (if it be the custom in the French Theatre), is not to the French Theatre's advantage.

I am, Sir, your constant reader,

Vester.

"NETTLEWIG HALL."

TO THE TATLER.

Dear Mr Tatler,—Allow me to call your attention to a most scandalous and imposing "puff" that daily appears in the bills of Drury Lane Theatre; videlicet, "Nettlewig Hall, or Ten to One, having been received with universal approbation," &c. &c.

Now, my dear Tatler, I happened to be present at the last representation of the above piece, and more insipid trash I never witnessed in any theatre. Believe me, that I am not actuated by any private feeling, as my opinion was often borne out by the repeated marks of disapprobation with which the piece was received by nearly three-fourths of the too good-humoured audience. What can be the Manager's motive for thrusting anything so unpalateable (as it proves itself on every representation) before the public, I cannot guess. A notification of this kind from your journal, so eminently and justly famed for impartial criticism, will perhaps have the effect of the Manager's withdrawing that piece, which certainly is only calculated to deteriorate from the well-earned fame of the establishment. Your delighted reader,

Philo-Tatler & Dramaticus.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

THURSDAY, APRIL 21, 1831.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

The Life of Sir Humphrey Davy, Bart. LL. D. late President of the Royal Society, Foreign Associate of the Royal Institute of France, &c. &c. &c. By John Ayrton Paris, M.D. Cantab. F.R.S. &c. Fellow of the Royal College of Physicians. 2 vols. 8vo. Colburn and Bentley.

The appearance of this new edition has given us an opportunity of noticing a work, the subject of which, though not exactly of the importance which the author would assign to it, is of no common or fugitive interest. If a biography concerned only the writer and his hero, we hardly know whether the perusal of this life would have given us greater pain or pleasure. Dr Paris does not scruple to be severe upon persons who thought they had reason to find fault, and in our opinion justly, with the character of Sir Humphrey Davy, and we shall therefore not hesitate to say, that besides omitting to give a sufficient idea of the grounds which they had for their objections, the Doctor has left an impression upon us, neither in favour of the work as a biography, nor of his hero as a man; certainly not as a philosopher. The Doctor is zealous in behalf of his friend, and would fain make him out to be everything that is good and great: he has, at the same time, a love of truth, which hinders him from doing so, and gives us an insight into his weaknesses; but as he has neither let the whole truth come out, nor thinks very deeply in his remarks upon what he has told us, we rise from the perusal of the work, with the sense of its being at once friendly and timid, ingenuous and disingenuous, interesting and provoking. What the writer takes for common remarks, are very common ones: what he takes for profundity, may be sounded by an angling-rod!

Dr Paris has discovered that war is a bad thing, and that conquerors are greatly overvalued; but because conquerors fight, and men of science do not, it never strikes him, that the latter may be overrated, for the same reason as conquerors; to wit, the extent of their operations, and the importance of their effects to mankind. A warrior can fire a town and massacre the inhabitants: the least thing he does, if he gains a victory, is to leave hundreds of dead and wounded on the field; and as the disputes of nations, or rather of kings, have been hitherto settled by brute force, the scientific talents of a general, wielding that brute force in its most formidable shape, and covered with all the glory that kings and vulgar opinion can heap on them, it is not easy to estimate according to their real merits. There has always been a suspicion among philosophers that conquerors were unduly valued; and the more the world has seen of their intellectual operation, upon matters not connected with their profession, especially of late years, the more they have begun to doubt, whether the amount of the means has not been confounded with the magnitude of the result. Now the results of scientific discovery are of a magnitude far exceeding those of mere warfare, and their admirers justly claim for them a greater veneration, on account of their utility. But the more the world gain an insight into the general intellectual powers and moral rank of the peaceful as well as warlike men of science, the more, we suspect, they are inclined to doubt whether the degree of superior admiration demanded of them in behalf of the former, be not founded on a mistake, similar to that which has given an undue renown to the characters of the Wellingtons and Napoleons.

It is a wonderful thing to discover a new metal; it is a mighty thing to set in operation the enormous giants of steam; it is a blessed thing to invent a lamp which shall realize the marvels of enchantment, and enable people in safety to walk the subterranean world: but is the genius so mighty that does all this! Do the discoveries really demand powers of discernment so extraordinary? Have the numbers of scientific men, like those who speculate on mind and morals, been so great, and their intellects so remarkable, as to render excellence in this department of knowledge so very wonderful? Have those men of science, who have really surprised the world, turned out, upon a close acquaintance with their history, men of such enlarged minds, and exalted characters, as the leaders in ethics and metaphysics? Will the celebrated French and English chymists, admirable though they are, bear comparison in these respects, with the Montaignes, the Bayles, the Lockes, the Humes, and the Adam Smiths? Have men of science at any time, generally speaking, exhibited the same universality of apprehension, government of the passions, and identification of themselves with the public good, apart from worldliness and vanity, as the moral and intellectual philosophers? Do we not, with a fear that blushes to doubt his consecrated name, but which ought not to be turned against us on that account, suspect that the extent of the mind of Newton himself, has been confounded with that of the sphere he worked in, and that the reposer in Arianism, who had a tendency to believe in the French prophets, who sneered at poetry, who took off his hat at the name of God, as he would to a king, and who makes the weak figure lately presented to us in the work published by Lord King, could not have had the vast, and all but divine understanding, which has formed part of his renown? In a word, is there not a little term, which has been gratuitously bestowed upon men of science, and which is likely to make them suffer for it beyond what they should? We mean the word philosopher. Chemists, natural historians, and others, have plentifully bestowed this title on one another, and their friends have echoed it. But how far is it, or is it not, an assumption? Has not a similar confusion of ideas taken place in this instance, to the one we have been speaking of; and the knowledge which of necessity produces glimpses into the regions of wisdom, been confounded with the love of it? Philosopher implies a lover of wisdom, but the man of science is not of necessity a lover of wisdom. He may be one; but the history of Sir Humphrey Davy is alone sufficient to shew, that the love of science and the love of wisdom, are not identical propositions: nay, that the amount of the one proves nothing in favour of the extent of the other. Men, far less scientific than he, have been far wiser, both in their speculations and their conduct. Dr Paris would fain make out that his friend was a metaphysician, a great speculative moralist, and a poet: at least he thinks, that if he was not actually a poet, he might have been one. The Doctor may be assured, that if Sir Humphrey could have been a great poet, he would have been. There was nothing to hinder him. There was only the little drawback of his having a passion to be something unpoetical.

We are far from wishing to undervalue science. We only wish to understand the truth of the matter. We delight in witnessing the progress of science, and in thinking of the infinite good it may produce: we delight in reading of the discoveries of Sir Humphrey Davy, and think him an extraordinary and admirable person. But all this does not make him a great philosopher, or a man who would have rivalled the greatest poets; that is to say, men whose reputation is founded upon the completest of all universalities, and who can do justice even to the half-knowledge that mocks them. Sir Humphrey Davy's poetry was sheer common-place, as his biographer has proved, though he does not know it; we mean by the specimens he has given us in his first volume. The Baronet's ethics we take to be an emanation from those of his friend Mr Coleridge, with the disadvantage of all the vitality being taken out of it, and a pure inability to follow the original stream; that is to say, Sir Humphrey's ethics are a sluggish, limited, and heavy-bodied cut, out of the shallower side of his friend's wonderful flow of thought. The quality of Sir Humphrey's mind, notwithstanding the air of his speculations, was as unetherial as possible: in fact, he was absorbed, like all men of science, in the formal and tangible,—subdued and this, as in their instance, was the excuse for what was weak and worldly in his character. There was nothing in his studies which of necessity involved wisdom; there was much in his discoveries, calculated, without wisdom, to injure him in its effect upon the marvelling beholders, and to make him pretend to what he did not possess. He was an admirable chemist, an ingenious writer, and, we take it, not an unkind or ungenerous man; but it is evident, from Dr Paris's work, that prosperity played the most unphilosophical tricks with him; made his unworldliness and even his kindness doubted; led him into foppery, at a time of life when other men are leaving off that puerility; and enabled him to see no deeper into a reason than was sufficient to reconcile him to his favourite pastime of angling! the propriety of which he sufficiently doubted, at the same time, to give a zest to the weakness of his will.

"To what he worked in, like the dyer's hand;"

Dr Paris has not entered, nor was it necessary that he should, into all the domestic particulars of Sir Humphrey's life. Too many persons are concerned in such particulars, to have them canvassed with delicacy; and the most ignorant and partial conclusions might be drawn from them, if they were canvassed. We do not mean to cast a shadow of blame upon Sir Humphrey, on account of anything omitted in that respect; but as the doctor has been severe upon Sir Humphrey's rebukers, he should not have left others to tell the stories on which they founded their disapprobation; that of his treatment of Borzelius, for one. It is alluded to in these volumes, but we have none of the particulars that made it so coxcombical and inexecusable. It is easy to answer on these occasions, that the greatest men have their weaknesses. Nobody doubts that. The question is, were such weaknesses as those of Sir Humphrey, those of the greatest men. Were they not those of a man who had nothing great in him, but his science? and is not this an additional proof, that we ought to find out some new compound term for men of science, (if something philo be necessary to them), and no longer assume that they must be philosophers?

The most admirable thing about the discoverers in science, is the courage with which they will undergo the chance of being killed and blown up. There is some philosophy, we grant, in this, making allowance even for military ardour! for it is connected with a liberal curiosity. In justice to Sir Humphrey, our first extract shall consist of accounts he has given us, to this effect; the second of which, is surely more "terrible and appalling" than the first, though his biographer thinks otherwise. At least, the circumstances act more forcibly upon the imagination of the reader.

'"Having observed," says Davy, "that no painful effects were produced by the application of nitrous gas to the bare muscular fibre, I began to imagine that this gas might also be breathed with impunity, provided it were possible in any way to free the lungs of common air before inspiration, so as to prevent the formation of nitrous acid.

'"On this supposition, during a fit of enthusiasm produced by the respiration of nitrous oxide, I resolved to endeavour to breathe nitrous gas: one hundred and fourteen cubic inches of it were accordingly introduced into the large mercurial air-holder; two small silk bags of the capacity of seven quarts were filled with nitrous oxide.

'"After a forced exhaustion of my lungs, my nose being accurately closed, I made three inspirations and expirations of nitrous oxide in one of the bags, in order to free my lungs, as much as possible, from atmospheric oxygen; then, after a full expiration of the nitrous oxide, I transferred my lips from the mouth-piece of the bag to that of the air-holder, and, turning the stop-cock, attempted to inspire the nitrous gas. In passing through my mouth and fauces, it tasted astringent and highly disagreeable; it occasioned a sense of burning in the throat, and produced a spasm of the epiglottis, so painful as to oblige me to desist immediately from attempts to inspire it. After removing my lips from the mouth-piece, when I opened them to inspire common air, nitrous acid was immediately formed in my mouth, which burnt the tongue and palate, injured the teeth, and produced an inflammation of the mucous membrane, which lasted for some hours.

'"As, after the respiration of nitrous oxide, a small portion of the residual atmospheric air always remained in the lungs mingled with the gas, so is it probable that, in the experiment just related, a minute portion of nitrous acid was formed; and if so, I perhaps owe the preservation of my life to the circumstance; for, supposing that I had succeeded in taking a full inspiration of the nitrous gas, and even that it had not produced any positive effects, it is not likely that I should, by breathing nitrous oxide, have so completely freed my lungs from it, as to have prevented the formation of nitrous acid when I again inspired common air. I never design again to attempt so rash an experiment."

'His attempt to breathe carburetted hydrogen gas was scarcely less terrific and appalling.

'"Mr Watt's observations on the respiration of diluted hydro-carbonate by man, and the experiments of Dr Beddoes on the destruction of animals by the same gas, proved that its effects were highly deleterious.

'"As it destroyed life, apparently by rendering the muscular fibre inirritable, without producing any previous excitement, I was anxious to compare its sensible effects with those of nitrous oxide, which at this time I believed to destroy life by producing the highest possible excitement.

'"In the first experiment, I breathed for nearly a minute three quarts of hydro-carbonate, mingled with nearly two quarts of atmospheric air.* It produced a slight giddiness, pain in the head, and a momentary loss of voluntary power; my pulse was rendered much quicker and more feeble. These effects, however, went off in five minutes, and I had no return of giddiness.

'"Emboldened by this trial, I introduced into a silk bag four quarts of gas nearly pure, which was carefully produced from the decomposition of water by charcoal an hour before, and which had a very strong and disagreeable smell.

'"My friend Mr James Tobin, junior, being present, after a forced exhaustion of my lungs, the nose being accurately closed, I made three inspirations and expirations of the hydro-carbonate. The first inspiration produced a sort of numbness and loss of feeling in the chest, and about the pectoral muscles. After the second, I lost all power of perceiving external things, and had no distinct sensation, except that of a terrible oppression on the chest. During the third expiration, this feeling subsided, I seemed sinking into annihilation, and had just power enough to cast off the mouth-piece from my unclosed lips.

'"A short interval must have passed, during which I respired common air, before the objects around me were distinguishable. On recollecting myself, I faintly articulated, 'I do not think I shall die.' Placing my finger on the wrist, I found my pulse thread-like, and beating with excessive quickness. In less than a minute I was able to walk, and the painful oppression on the chest directed me to the open air.

'"After making a few steps, which carried me to the garden, my head became giddy, my knees trembled, and I had just sufficient voluntary power to throw myself on the grass. Here the painful feelings of the chest increased with such violence as to threaten suffocation. At this moment I asked for some nitrous oxide. Mr Dwyer brought me a mixture of the gas with oxygen, and I breathed it for a minute, and believed myself recovered.

'"In five minutes the painful feelings began gradually to diminish; in an hour they had nearly disappeared, and I felt only excessive weakness, and a slight swimming of the head. My voice was very feeble and indistinct.

'"I afterwards walked slowly for half an hour with Mr Tobin, and on my return was so much stronger and better as to believe that the effects of the gas had entirely passed off; though my pulse was 120, and very feeble. I continued without pain for nearly three quarters of an hour, when the giddiness returned with such violence as to oblige me to lie on the bed; it was accompanied with nausea, loss of memory, and deficient sensation.

'"In about an hour and a half the giddiness went off, and was succeeded by an excruciating pain in the forehead, and between the eyes, with transient pains in the chest and extremities.

'"Towards night these affections gradually diminished; and at ten no disagreeable feeling, except weakness, remained. I slept sound, and awoke in the morning very feeble and very hungry. No recurrence of the symptoms took place, and I had nearly recovered my strength by the evening.

'"I have been minute in the account of this experiment, because it proves that hydro-carbonate acts as a sedative; that is, it produces diminution of vital action, and consequent debility, without previously exciting. There is every reason to believe that, had I taken four or five inspirations, instead of three, they would have destroyed life immediately, without producing any painful sensation."'

* '"I believe it had never been breathed before by any individual in a state so little diluted."'

MINING IN SOUTH AMERICA.—For three hundred years, mining has been the favourite pursuit of the Spanish Americans; it is a species of gambling in which they delight; but the wiser of their race have a good saying on the subject, to this effect:—"If a man find only dirt on his land, he may grow rich,—if he find silver, he is sure to become poor,—and if gold, to be ruined."—Beaumont's Buenos Ayres.

PASSAGES FROM COWPER'S LETTERS.—I remember having been told by Colman, that when he once dined with Garrick, he repeatedly pressed him to eat more of a certain dish that he was known to be particularly fond of; Colman as often refused, and at last declared he could not.—"But could not you," says Garrick, "if you were in a dark closet by yourself."

— An officer of a regiment, part of which is quartered here, gave one of the soldiers leave to be drunk six weeks, in hopes of curing him by satiety;—he was drunk six weeks, and is so still, as often as he can find an opportunity. One vice may swallow up another, but no coroner, in the state of Ethics, ever brought in his verdict, when a vice died, that it was—felo de se.

— I told you I read the book with great pleasure, which may be accounted for from its own merit; but perhaps it pleased me the more, because you had travelled the same road before me. You know there is such a pleasure as this, which would want great explanation to some folks, being, perhaps, a mystery to those whose hearts are a mere muscle, and serve only for the purposes of an even circulation.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

THE PAUPERS' JUBILEE.

TO THE TATLER.

E——— Workhouse, April 9, 1831.

SIR,—Having lately seen in the papers several pieces of verse by "uneducated poets," I am encouraged to send you a specimen of what we can do in our parish. It is not, I confess, a first attempt; nor will it, probably, if I have health and strength, be the last.

I am, Sir, your constant reader, for nearly 20 years,

JOHN DANTON.

HURRAH! Who was e'er so gay
As we merry folks to-day?
Brother beggars, do not stare,
But toss your rags into the air,
And cry, "No work, and better fare!"
Each man, be he saint or sinner,
Shall to-day have—MEAT for dinner!!!

Yesterday, oh, yesterday!
That indeed was a bad day;
Iron bread, and rascal gruel,
Water drink, and scanty fuel,
With the beadle at our backs,
Cursing us as we beat flax,
Just like twelve Old Bailey varlets,
Amongst ochre-picking harlots.

Why should we such things endure?
Though we be the Parish Poor,
This is usage bad and rough:
Are not age and pain enough—
Lonely age, unpitied pain,
With the Ban, that like a chain,
To our prison bare hath bound us,
And the unwelcomed Winter round us?

Why should we for ever work?
Do we starve beneath the Turk,
That, with one foot in the grave,
We should still toil like the slave?
Seventy winters on our heads,
Yet we freeze on wooden beds,
With one blanket for a fold,
That lets in the horrid cold,
And cramps and agues manifold.

Yet,—sometimes we're merry people,
When the chimes clang in the steeple:
If 't be summer-time, we all
(Dropsied, palsied, crippled) crawl
Underneath the sunny wall;
Up and down, like worms, we creep,
Or stand still and fall asleep,
With our faces in the sun,
Forgetting all the world has done!

If 't be May, with hawthorn blooms
In our breasts, we sit on tombs,
And spell o'er, with eager ken,
The epitaphs of older men
(Choosing those, for some strange reasons, Who've weather'd ninety—a hundred seasons)
Till forth at last we shout in chorus,
"We've thirty good years STILL before us!"

But to-day's a bonny day;
What shall we be doing?
What's the use of saving money,
When rivers flow with milk and honey?
Prudence is our ruin:
What have we to do with Care?
Who, to be a Pauper's heir,
Would mask his false face in a smile,
Or hide his honest hate in guile?

But come,—Why do we loiter here?
Boy! go get us some small beer:
Quick! 'Twill make our bloods run quicker,
And drown the devil Pain in liquor.
March, so cold, is almost past,
April will be here at last;
And May must come,
When bees do hum,
And Summer over Cold victorious:
Hurrah! 'Tis a prospect glorious:—
Meat! Small Beer! and Warmer Weather!
Come, boys,—let's be mad together!

J. D—N.

[J. D—n is not one of those, of whom it can be said "Videri vult pauper, et est pauper." His poverties are rich and admirable. There is capital stuff in this poem, and a reach of feeling and thought far deeper than its merriment seems to announce.—EDIT. TATLER.]

COVENT GARDEN.

THE play of the Maid of Honour, which was performed at this theatre last night for the first time since the year 1785 (when we understand the KEMBLES first revived it) is a curious instance of the perversity of design attributed to MASSINGER'S genius by a late eminent critic. We allude to the opinion quoted from Mr HAZLITT in a late number of the Tatler. The heroine, who gives the title to the piece, is a young lady of Palermo, who has secretly fixed her affections on a young Knight of Malta (Mr C. KEMBLE), and refuses him when he seeks her in marriage, because his order implies a vow of celibacy. He says he can get a dispensation from the Pope; but this she will not hear of, because vows made to heaven ought not to be broken for earthly purposes. This is a pious sentiment, though unfortunately not very Catholic; but the Pope is not to stand in the way of the lady's perversity. Bertoldo (so the Knight is named), goes to the wars in despair, and gets taken prisoner. The King of Sicily, his brother (he was a natural son of the late King) refuses to ransom him, because the war he assisted in was an unjust one, and even in violation of his knightly oath, having been waged against a woman. Camiola, the Maid of Honour, hearing of his captivity, generously sends two-thirds of her fortune to effect his deliverance, adding, in contempt of her former scruples and of his new infidelity to his order, a request that he will marry. To complete the self-will of this arrangement, the messenger who is despatched on this errand of love and joy is a poor gentleman, her kinsman and unsuccessful adorer (Mr BENNETT). Bertoldo, in raptures, willingly signs a bond to be made happy; but the Princess, against whom he had fought, seeing him, falls in love, and offers him her crown, which, with the shortest possible fit of remorse, (not more than three minutes or so) he accepts. She accompanies him home to Sicily, and they present themselves as future man and wife to the King, who pardons him for the sake of his alliance. Meanwhile, the poor messenger has returned to Camiola with intelligence of his rival's deliverance and faithlessness; and because he owns that he did not grieve at the man's villainy, as she wishes him to have done, she tells him he is of a malicious disposition, and reads him a formal lecture upon it, sixteen lines long. She then proceeds to court, confronts Bertoldo before his Princess and the King, succeeds in preventing his marriage, and making him penitent, and finally, directs a certain friar to be called for, in order that she may be "married." Bertoldo has the grace to suppose that the marriage cannot be intended for himself; Signor Sylli, a rich fool (KEELEY), who has long been a fantastic suitor to her, concludes that he is to be the happy man; and the spectator makes up his mind that she is to do one reasonable thing in the course of her life, and marry her true lover, the poor kinsman. No: she makes her parade, completes her perversity, and marries heaven! videlicet, turns nun. However, she leaves the poor man some money. She then, in order to leave no piece of pragmaticalness undone, gives an injunction to Bertoldo to resume the cross of his order (and of course the celibacy with it) which he, like an accommodating miserable gentleman, agrees to; and so the curtain falls.

As this is one of the most foolishly perverse, so it is altogether one of the poorest plays of MASSINGER, having nothing worthy of his reputation in incident, character, or dialogue. Its morals are fantastic; its impression, except at the last moment, feeble; and then, when it excites attention, it disappoints it.

It was heard, for the most part, with little interest. Miss KEMBLE was more pleasingly dressed than we remember to have seen her; her black locks were very gracefully arranged, and her yellow robe suited them. But she made few "points," as they are called; none, till the conclusion; and the other performers can hardly be said to have done more, taken all together. KEELEY's part was well done, but there was little to do in it. CHARLES KEMBLE was dressed with his usual gallant good taste, and looked like a very knight. There was nothing so good as his look, in the author's share of him. The getting up of the play, in point of scenes and decorations, is excellent; and there was considerable approbation when the curtain fell; but we cannot anticipate a long run for it. One of Mr KNOWLES's tragedies beats this production of a celebrated name, all to pieces.

NAMES OF SHIPS.—The names of ships are sometimes rendered very ludicrous by the context. In looking into Beaumont's Buenos Ayres this morning, the first passage I opened upon, was this:—"The arrival of the Countess of Morley is looked forward to at Buenos Ayres, as an addition to their navy."—In the same page, we are told that the Harmony is a war-ship. Sometimes we are given to understand that princes, kings, queens, and emperors, are subject to the command of Captains Smith, or Jenkins; that the Invincible has been taken by the enemy; that Aurora disappeared at day-break, that the Zephyr is seen advancing from the east, and that Apollo went down at noon-day; the Sophias, Janes, and Arabellas, are made to carry heavy cargoes; and Mercury and Camilla are left behind, being unable to keep pace with John Bull.

ANECDOTES OF POPE.—During Pope's residence at Binfield, he passed many hours at Oakingham, in a little back parlour, at the Rose Inn, called the Mitre. In the wall of the room was a small recess, called Pope's Repository, in which he frequently committed to paper ideas that occasionally occurred to him. In that room was written Molly Mogg, the joint production of Pope, Gray, and Swift, in their moments of hilarity. The Rose Inn was kept by two sisters, and it was to celebrate the beauty of the younger that this song was composed. * * * * Mr B. a respectable barber at Oakingham, frequently declared that he dreaded going to Mr Pope's house to shave him, as he scarcely ever could perform it under an hour, and very often it would take him an hour and a half, and sometimes two hours, as during the operation, he was continually ordered to stop, while Mr Pope penned down his occasional thoughts.—Life of Gilbert Wakefield.

PLEASURE OF BEING AN EMPEROR.—When the Emperor Joseph the Second was in Paris, in the reign of Louis the Sixteenth, he was in the habit of walking about the city incognito. One morning, he went into an elegant coffee-house, and asked for a cup of chocolate. He was plainly dressed, and the waiters insolently refused it, saying it was too early. Without making any reply, he walked out, and went into a little coffee-house, nicknamed the one-eyed. He asked for a cup of chocolate, and the landlord politely answered that it should be ready in a moment. While he waited for it, as the coffee-house was empty, he walked up and down, and was conversing on different subjects, when the landlord's daughter, a very pretty girl, made her appearance. The Emperor wished her a good day, according to the French mode; and observed to her father that it was time she should be married. "Ah!" replied the old man; "if I had but a thousand crowns, I could marry her to a man who is very fond of her—but, Sir,—the chocolate is ready." The Emperor called for pen, ink, and paper; the girl ran to fetch them; and he gave her an order on his banker for six thousand livres.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

The Life of Sir Humphrey Davy, Bart. LL.D. late President of the Royal Society, Foreign Associate of the Royal Institute of France, &c. &c. &c. By John Ayrton Paris, M.D. Cantab. F.R.S. &c. Fellow of the Royal College of Physicians. 2 vols. 8vo. Colburn and Bentley.

We shall now give a few specimens of the universalities of this illustrious chemist,—a few among many, from which the reader may judge of his right to the title of philosopher. A philosopher is not bound to love pictures, or to be without those tendencies to superstition which may be generated, we grant, in a wise as well as an ignorant consciousness of the unknown. Neither is it incumbent upon him to have a perfect address, especially after early habits of rusticity. But he is bound to know the value and dignity of art: he is bound not to give himself airs in the presence of its noblest productions; he is bound to controul his tendencies to superstition, instead of giving way to them: and when he finds his personal manners at a disadvantage with those who think less of themselves, or have received a luckier breeding, he is bound to rate address at what it is worth; or at all events, to make the simplest and most rational compromise with his awkwardness, avoiding an air of arrogance above all things.

'Sir Humphrey was conducted by Mr Underwood to the Louvre. The English philosopher walked with a rapid step across the gallery, and to the great astonishment and mortification of his friend and cicerone, did not direct his attention to a single painting. The only exclamation of surprise that escaped him was—"What an extraordinary collection of fine frames!" On arriving opposite to Raphael's picture of the Transfiguration, Mr Underwood could no longer suppress his surprise, and in a tone of enthusiasm he directed the attention of the philosopher to that most sublime production of art, and the chef-d'œuvre of the collection. Davy's reply was as laconic as it was chilling.—"Indeed, I am glad I have seen it;" and then hurried forward, as if he were desirous of escaping from any critical remarks upon its excellencies.

'They afterwards descended to view the statues in the lower apartments; here he displayed the same frigid indifference towards the higher works of art. A spectator of the scene might have well imagined that some mighty spell was in operation, by which the order of nature had been reversed:—while the marble glowed with more than human passion, the living man was colder than stone. The apathy, the total want of feeling he betrayed on having his attention directed to the Apollo Belvidere, the Laocoon, and Venus de Medicis, was as inexplicable as it was provoking, but an exclamation of the most vivid surprise escaped him at the sight of an Antinous, treated in the Egyptian style, and sculptured in alubaster. "Gracious powers," said he, "what a beautiful stalactite!"

'What a strange—what a discordant anomaly in the construction of the human mind do these anecdotes unfold! we have here presented to us a philosopher, who, with the glowing fancy of a poet, is insensible to the divine beauties of the sister-arts! Let the metaphysician, if he can, unravel the mystery,—the biographer has only to observe, that the Muses could never have danced in chorus at his birth.'—Vol. II. p. 10.

No: the biographer should first have ascertained whether there was any mystery to unravel. Dr Paris begs the question, and then wonders at it. He has first to prove to us that Sir Humphrey was a philosopher, and had the glowing fancy of a poet; neither of which we take his book to have done.

'November 17th.—Mr Underwood states that on this day he met Humboldt at dinner at Davy's hotel, and he adds—"I do not know whether you are aware that Sir Humphrey had a superstitious dislike at seeing a knife and fork placed cross-wise on a plate at dinner, or upon any other occasion; but I can assure you that such was the fact; and when it occurred in the company of his intimate friends, he always requested that they might be displaced; whenever this could not be done, he was evidently very uncomfortable.'*—P. 17.

* I repeat this as I received it: from my own personal knowledge I can neither confirm nor refute it; although I am inclined to believe that Davy was tinged with a degree of superstitious feeling, or a certain undefined species of credulity, which shelters itself under the acknowledged inadequacy of human reason, to connect causes with effects.'

* * * * * * *

'It was on the 13th of December 1813, that Davy was elected a corresponding member of the first class of the Institute; there were forty-eight members present, and he had forty-seven votes: Guyton de Morveau being the only person who opposed his election.

'Nothing ever exceeded the liberality and unaffected kindness and attention with which the savans of France had received and caressed the English philosopher. Their conduct was the triumph of science over national animosity,—a homage to genius, alike honourable to those who bestowed, and to him who received it; and it would be an act of ingratitude, a violation of historical justice, on the part of the English biographer, did he omit to express the pride and admiration with which every philosopher in his country continues to regard it. It would have been fortunate for the cause of science, and fortunate to the historian, could he have terminated the subject with these remarks; but the biographer has an act of justice to perform, which he must not suffer his friendship to evade, nor his partialities to compromise.

'It would be an act of literary dishonesty, to say that Sir Humphrey Davy returned the kindness of the savans of France, in a manner which the friends of science could have expected and desired. There was a flippancy in his manner, and superciliousness and hauteur in his deportment, which surprised as much as they offended. Whatever opinions he might have formed as to the talents of the leading chemists, it was weakness to betray, and arrogance to avow them.

'He had, by a single blow, fatally mutilated the system which was the pride and glory of the nation; it was ungenerous to remind them of his triumph. It required but little tact to have reconciled the French philosophers to the revolution he had effected; but, unfortunately, that cannot be said of Davy, which was so wittily observed of Voltaire,—that if he trod upon the toes of their prejudices, he touched his hat at the same time: even the affair of Jodine, had it been skilfully managed, would never have left an angry feeling. It was not his success, but the manner in which he spoke of it, that rendered it so offensive. He should have acted according to the judicious advice given to a member of the clerical profession, upon his consulting a friend as to the propriety of his continuing his field sports, should he become a dignitary of the church—"You may hunt, but you must not holloa."

'It may be supposed that the unguarded conduct of Davy reached the ear of the Emperor, for in a conversation with one of the leading members of the Institute, Napoleon took occasion to observe, that he understood the young English chemist held them all in low repute.

'Having thus candidly avowed the errors of Davy, I may be justified in claiming from the reader his confidence in the sincerity with which I shall attempt to palliate them. From my personal knowledge of his character, I am inclined to refer much of that unfortunate manner, which has been considered as the expression of a haughty consciousness of superiority, to the desire of concealing a mauvaise honte and gaucherie—an ungraceful timidity which he could never conquer. The bashful man, if he possess strong passions, will frequently force himself into a state of effrontery, by a violence of effort, which passes amongst ordinary observers for the sallies of pride, or the ebullitions of temper; whereas, if, on the contrary, his temper be cold and passionless, he will exhibit traits of the most painful reserve. This proposition cannot, perhaps, be more forcibly illustrated than by a comparison of the manners of Davy and Cavendish, whose temperaments were certainly as much opposed to each other, as fire is to ice: the latter, however, was shy and bashful to a degree bordering upon disease, and nothing so much distressed him as an introduction to strangers, or as his being pointed out as a person distinguished in science. On one of the Sunday evening soirées of Sir Joseph Banks, he happened to be conversing with his friend Mr Hatchett, when Dr Ingenhouz, who was rather remarkable for pomposity of manner, approached him with an Austrian gentleman in his hand, and introduced him formally to Mr Cavendish. He recounted the titles and qualifications of his foreign friend at great length, and concluded by saying, that he had been particularly anxious to be introduced to a philosopher so universally celebrated throughout Europe as Mr Cavendish. As soon as Dr Ingenhouz had finished, the Austrian gentleman began; he assured Mr Cavendish, that one of his principal inducements in coming to London, was to see and converse with one whom he considered the most distinguished chemist of the age. To all these high-flown addresses, Mr Cavendish answered not a single word, but stood with his eyes cast down on the floor, in a state of the most painful confusion. At length, espying an opening in the crowd, he darted through it with all the speed he could command, and never stopped until he reached his carriage, which immediately drove him home.

'From the same cause, probably, arose Davy's inattention and carelessness in those little observances of etiquette, which many may treat as empty and unmeaning ceremonials, but which the members of a polished community regard as the delicate expression of feeling and the language of sentiment.

'It is said that on conversing in the chamber of the Institute, he received one of its most distinguished and venerable members, who approached him with the air of salutation, without rising from his seat; a circumstance, perhaps, in itself of a very trifling importance, but it was considered a mark of disrespect, which is not readily forgiven, when a spirit of rivalry may be supposed to sharpen the affront. It will be remembered that Cæsar might date his loss of popularity to the fact of his having received the Senate, while sitting in the porch of the Temple of Venus, and that it formed one of the chief pretences of those who organised the conspiracy against his person.'—P. 26.

A courtesy may be a trifle, and yet the omission of it a great matter. It may show the temper of a man's mind to a painful excess, and warrant the most benignant wisdom, in thinking him ill qualified to pretend to an equality of rank with it, much less a superiority.

DOCTOR BURNEY'S INTERVIEW WITH VOLTAIRE, IN 1770.

My going to Mr Fritz, broke into a plan which I had formed of visiting M. de Voltaire, at the same hour with some other strangers, who were then going to Ferney. But, to say the truth, besides the visit to M. Fritz being more my business, I did not much like going with these people, who had only a bookseller to introduce them; and I had heard that some English had lately met with a rebuff from M. de Voltaire, by going without any letter of recommendation, or anything to recommend themselves. He asked them what they wanted? Upon their replying they wished only to see so extraordinary a man, he said—"Well, gentlemen, you now see me—did you take me for a wild beast, or monster that was fit only to be stared at as a show?" This story very much frightened me; for not having any intention of going to Geneva, when I left London, or even Paris, I was quite unprovided with a recommendation: however I was determined to see the place of his residence, which I took to be—to which he had retired in 1755, but was mistaken. I drove to it alone, after I had left M. Fritz. This house is three or four miles from Geneva, but near the lake. I approached it with reverence, and a curiosity of the most minute kind. I inquired when I first trod on his domain; I had an intelligent and talkative postillion, who answered all my questions very satisfactorily. His estate is very large here, and he is building pretty farm-houses upon it. He has erected on the Geneva side a quadrangular justice, or gallows, to show that he is the seigneur. One of his farms, or rather manufacturing houses, for he is establishing a manufacture upon his estate, was so handsome that I thought it was his château. We drove to Ferney, through a charming country, covered with corn and vines, in view of the lake and mountains of Gex, Switzerland, and Savoy. On the left hand, approaching the house, is a neat chapel, with this inscription:—

I sent to enquire whether a stranger might be allowed to see the house and gardens, and was answered in the affirmative. A servant soon came, and conducted me into the cabinet or closet where his master had just been writing, which is never shown when he is at home; but having walked out, I was allowed that privilege. From thence I passed to the library, which is not a very large one, but well filled. Here I found a whole length figure in marble of himself, recumbent, in one of the windows; and many curiosities in another room; a bust of himself, made not two years since; his mother's picture; that of his niece, Madame Denis; his brother, M. Dupuis; the Calas family, and others. It is a very neat and elegant house, not large, nor affectedly decorated.

I should first have remarked, that close to the chapel, between that and the house, is the theatre, which he built some years ago, where he treated his friends with some of his own tragedies: it is now only used as a receptacle for wood and lumber, there having been no play acted in it these four years. The servant told me his master was seventy-eight, but very well. "Il travaille," said he, "pendant dix heures chaque jour." He studies ten hours every day; writes constantly without spectacles, and walks out with only a domestic, often a mile or two—"Et le voila, là bas!" and see, yonder where he is.

* When this building was constructed, M. de Voltaire gave a curious reason for placing upon it this inscription. He said that it was high time to dedicate one church to God, after so many had been dedicated to Saints.

He was going to his workmen. My heart leaped at the sight of so extraordinary a man. He had just then quitted his garden, and was crossing the court before his house. Seeing my chaise, and me on the point of mounting it, he made a sign to his servant, who had been my cicerone, to go to him, in order, I suppose, to enquire who I was. After they had exchanged a few words together, he approached the place where I stood motionless, in order to contemplate his person as much as I could when his eyes were turned from me; but on seeing him move towards me, I found myself drawn by some irresistible power towards him, and, without knowing what I did, I insensibly met him half-way.

It is not easy to conceive it possible for life to subsist in a form so nearly composed of mere skin and bone, as that of M. de Voltaire. He complained of decrepitude, and said he supposed I was anxious to form an idea of the figure of one walking after death. However, his eyes and whole countenance are still full of fire; and though so emaciated, a more lively expression cannot be imagined.

He enquired after English news, and observed that poetical squabbles had given way to political ones; but seemed to think the spirit of opposition as necessary in poetry as in politics. "*Les querelles d'auteurs sont pour le bien de la littérature, comme dans un gouvernement libre, les querelles des grands, et les clameurs des petits, sont nécessaire à la liberté. And added, "when critics are silent, it does not so much prove the age to be correct, as dull." He enquired what poets we had now; I told him we had Mason and Gray. They write but little, said he; and you seem to have no one who lords it over the rest like Dryden, Pope, and Swift. I told him that it was one of the inconveniences of periodical journals, however well executed, that they often silenced modest men of genius, while impudent blockheads were impenetrable, and unable to feel the critic's scourge: that Mr Gray and Mr Mason had both been illiberally treated by mechanical critics, even in newspapers; and added, that modesty and love of quiet seemed in these gentlemen to have got the better even of their love of fame.

During this conversation, we approached the buildings that he was constructing near the road to his château. These, said he, pointing to them, are the most innocent, and perhaps the most useful of all my works. I observed that he had other works, which were of far more extensive use, and would be much more durable than those. He was so obliging as to show me several farm-houses that he had built, and the plans of others; after which I took my leave, for fear of breaking in upon his time, being unwilling to rob the public of things so precious as the few remaining moments of this great and universal genius.—Burney's Musical Tour in France and Italy.

* Disputes among authors are of use to literature; as the quarrels of the great, and the clamours of the little, in a free government, are necessary to liberty.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

TO MY COUNTRY.

ENGLAND! that in thy confidence of power
Dost lie like guarded sleep—keep wide thine eyes!
Time on his grey wing bears a whirlwind hour,
That shall make chaff of all thy vanities:
But of that scattering, whether smiles or sighs
Shall be the issue, doth depend on thee—
Awake, old country! from thine apathy;
And, gentle mother! make thine offspring blest
With more of equal plenty and sweet rest
Than is their dowry now, that they may feel
A filial heart beat for their parent's weal:
Let not a few wax gross with luxury,
Whilst thousands famish on one scanty meal—
Old parent, wake! and hear thy children's cry.

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

ARBITRARY GOVERNMENT.—Were I asked who is the most arbitrary sovereign on earth, I should answer, neither the King of France nor the Grand Signior, but an overseer of the poor in England.—Cowper.

A LIBERAL ACTION LIBERALLY REWARDED.—The celebrated banker, Tortonia, of Rome, was the son of a valet de place. Tortonia, who was an active and intelligent young man, at first entered into business in a small way as a jeweller. In course of time, he became a sort of banker; and an unexpected circumstance brought him in contact with Cardinal Chiaramonti. On the death of Pius VI, a conclave was to be held at Venice for the election of a new Pope. Chiaramonti was unable to attend for want of money, and Tortonia advanced him a few hundred crowns. The Cardinal accordingly repaired to Venice, where in the church of St George, he was elected Pope, under the title of Pius VII. In gratitude for this act of service, the Sovereign Pontiff, on his return to Rome, appointed him banker to the court. He was created a marquis, and afterwards a duke, and is now perhaps one of the richest capitalists in Europe.—Journal of a Nobleman.

A Poet's Hermitage.—When poets talk of cottages, hermitages, and such like things, they mean a house with six sashes in front, two comfortable parlours, a smart staircase, and three bedchambers, of convenient dimensions; in short, such a house as this [the poet's house at Weston.]—Cowper.

French Politeness in Low Life.—I accompanied two ladies to the Champs Elysees, to see the sports upon the occasion of the Fête St Louis. From various booths they were distributing, as is customary, bread, sausages, and wine, to the populace. A charbonnier—one of the lowest of the low—who had been unsuccessful in getting his little barrel filled at one of the booths, was hastening to another. His clothes were begrimed; and from head to foot was he discoloured by the wine which had been spilt over him. He looked like the Red Demon in Der Freischutz. As his path lay immediately in the direction where we were standing, and I had a lady on each arm, it was impossible for him to pass, on either side, without leaving on the dress of one of them a disagreeable recollection of his transit. Now, I have no hesitation in saying that not an individual of the whole body of English coal-heavers—for whom I entertain, in all other respects, profound veneration—but would have made his way (especially if it had led to a pot of porter) without consideration of consequences to silk or muslin; nor am I quite certain but that he would have derived a savage pleasure from the mischief he might have committed. Not so Monsieur le charbonnier. On approaching us he stopped; and gently touching my elbow with a tip of a finger, at the same time taking off his hat and making a bow to the ladies, he said—"Pardon, Monsieur; c'est pour ne par salir ces dames." We drew aside, in order that he might pass. He took the opportunity as gingerly as possible; and honouring us with another bow, and a "Merci, Monsieur et Mesdames," away he scampered. Now I think it may safely be said that the finest courtier in Europe—though his bow might have been more graceful, and his manner altogether more refined—could not have done the thing in better taste or with better feeling. It was a specimen of the truest politeness—the politeness of the heart.—After-dinner Chat—New Monthly Magazine.

Another Musical Duel.—Since I wrote last, we have had a visit from ——— I did not feel myself vehemently disposed to receive him with that complaisance from which a stranger generally infers that he is welcome. By his manner, which was rather bold than easy, I judged that there was no occasion for it, and that it was a trifle which, if he did not meet with, neither would he feel the want of. He has the air of a travelled man, but not of a travelled gentleman; is quite delivered from that reserve which is so common an ingredient in the English character, yet does not open himself gently and gradually, as men of polite behaviour do, but bursts upon you all at once. He talks very loud, and when our poor little robins hear a great noise, they are immediately seized with an ambition to surpass it;—the increase of their vociferation occasioned an increase of his, and his in return acted as a stimulus upon theirs—neither side entertained a thought of giving up the contest, which became continually more interesting to our ears during the whole visit. The birds however survived it, and so did we. They, perhaps, flatter themselves they gained a complete victory, but I believe Mr ———, could have killed them both in another hour.—[It is melancholy to contrast the melancholy of Cowper's latter years, with the easy cheerfulness observable in this, and very many other of Cowper's letters to his friends. It is scarcely possible to write with a more amiable and confiding familiarity; he has—(to use his own words, in speaking of another writer "an air of pleasantry, good-nature, and humanity, that makes him, in my mind, one of the most amiable writers in the world."]

A Swallow's Nest at Sea.—In the harbour of St Peter and St Paul there is sufficient depth of water close to the shore to admit of landing by means of a plank only. This proximity led a pair of swallows to mistake our frigate for a building upon terra firma, and, to the infinite delight of the sailors, who regarded it as a lucky omen, they deliberately built themselves a nest close to my cabin. Undisturbed by the noise in the ship, the loving pair hatched their brood in safety, fed their young ones with the tenderest care, and cheered them with joyous songs. But when on a sudden they saw their peaceful dwelling removing from the land, they seemed astonished, and hovered anxiously about the ship, yet still fetched food for their young from the shore, till the distance became too great. The struggle between the instincts of self-preservation and parental love then became perceptible. They flew round the vessel, then vanished for a while, then suddenly returned to their hungry family, and stretching their open beaks towards them, seemed to lament that no food was to be found. This alternate disappearing and returning continued some time, and terminated in the parents returning no more. The sailors then took on themselves the care of the deserted orphans. They removed them from the nest, where the parents' warmth was necessary, to another lined with cotton, and fixed in a warm place, and fed them with flies, which seemed to please their palates very well. The system at first appeared to have perfectly succeeded, and we were in hopes of carrying them safely to America; when, in spite of the most careful attention, they fell sick, and on the eighth day, to the general sorrow, not one of our nurslings remained alive.—Kotzebue's New Voyage round the World.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

Covent-Garden.—Asor and Zemira—And Nouha's Cave.

Queen's Theatre.

We have little to say of the new musical piece here, entitled Pescadilloes. It is the old story of two gallants (Mr E. Seguin and Mr Bennett) in love with each other's wives (Miss Dix and Miss Vernon), and led by the contrivances of a chambermaid (Mrs Humby) to have hopeful assignations with their own! With this chambermaid, there is of course an intriguing valet to match (Mr Green). The substance of the action and dialogue is thinly scattered over a larger surface than is quite warrantable; and the dialogue is not remarkable for originality, any more than the plot; but it is neat, and we should say, in some parts, gives evidences of a taste in style above the vulgar. The best, though not the most probable thing in the piece, is the appearance of the two gallants suddenly confronting one another on the balconies of each other's houses, and drawing their swords in the vain distance. This amused the audience a good deal, and with reason.

The music, by Mr Grattan Cooke, does not impress us with much sense of its novelty; and yet it strikes us as some of the most promising we have heard a long time from a young composer (which we understand him to be). There is an elegance above the common in many of the harmonies: we should say, that there is something unvulgar about the style of the whole of it; and we should not wonder, if the opening bass song, sung by Mr Seguin became a favourite.

Mr Seguin, who has got as genuine a sonorous bass voice as if he sang inside a cauldron, did justice to this composition; but we cannot say so much for his acting in the piece, as in Galatea. He seems less at home as he approaches to common life. We hardly know what to say to Miss Dix. She seems a painstaking singer, and ambitious to be a speaker as well; which is a good ambition. We should say at present, that she promised to be a better actress than singer; for there is a crudeness in her voice, which makes it seem as if it had been prematurely brought forward, and she does not assist it by any great ripeness of feeling or richness of execution. Mr Green sang a song about ladies and the moon with better skill than we had looked for, and with more success perhaps than he himself expected; for he hazarded some doubtful jocosities of manner at the conclusion, of which it is not easy to see the zest; but they turned out well. He got an encore.

Adelphi.

We were not aware the first night of the new entertainments here, that one of the reasons why the last part of them failed, was an offence strongly and justly taken by some of the audience, at Mr Yates's exhibition of a poor woman known in the city as a sufferer under mental alienation. How a man of his sense could think of introducing such a character, is hardly conceivable; but as we understand it has been dropped in the last performance (together with a mistake of a similar kind on the part of Mr Mathews) we are glad to be relieved from the necessity of saying anything more about it. The warmth with which the objectors took the matter up, especially one gentleman in the front seat of the pit, whose fervour did him honour, may be easily understood, when we read the following account of this unfortunate woman, which has been furnished us by an estimable correspondent:—

'The hapless female is well known at the Bank, and in its vicinity. Her brother was some years ago a clerk there—committed a forgery—was tried, and executed. This poor creature, then a handsome and interesting girl, became insane; and from that time has haunted the offices and purlieus of the place in a black, shroud-like dress, the spectre of her former self, gibbering of claims and bonds and frauds, and startling some of the "gentlemen" with strange expressions allusive to her brother's fate. She is daily in the City, except on Sundays; you may then see her, in all weathers, going along the Kent road towards Greenwich. When she arrives there, she takes a seat in the park, on a bench by herself: the deer know her, and stricken as she is, come to her; she feeds them from her little scrip of a basket, and I have seen them lick her hands. She is harmless and friendless—God help her, and God forgive those who ridicule her.'

Mr Yates could surely not have been aware of the extent of these circumstances. She must have been represented to him as a woman merely fantastic. ☞

EFFECT OF THE PROROGATION OF PARLIAMENT.

ENTHUSIASTIC EXPRESSION OF PUBLIC FEELING AT DRURY LANE LAST NIGHT.

DEAR MR TATLER,—I have just come from the Theatre. The whole audience, after the performance of "Nettlewig Hall" (which, by the bye, has been damned half a dozen times) rose as if by previous concert, and amidst cries of "Reform! Reform!" called for 'God save the King.' Cheering continued loud and lustily for about ten minutes, after which the curtain drew up, and presented a crowded stage, among whom were Mrs Waylett, Mr Bedford, and (I believe) Miss Pearson. Their appearance was greeted with great applause, interrupted, however, by occasional cries of "Hear, hear!" The latter lady sang the first verse (as uncomposedly as the suddenness of the occasion would lead one to expect) Bedford gave the second, and Mrs Waylett, in her usual pleasing style, sang the third, the audience joining in the chorus, in a glorious strain of patriotic discord.

I am, dear Mr T.

Your constant Reader,

EXTRACTS FROM NEW BOOKS.

A FORTUNATE RENCONTRE.

In a gloomy day, in the month of November, a traveller on horseback stopped at the door of an inn in the village of Ruelle, which adjoins the park of Malmaison. The hostess went out to receive him, and having given his horse to the stable boy, he ordered dinner. He was shewn into the best room in the house, and the busy hostess set about preparing his repast. In a few minutes another traveller on horseback stopped at the inn, and also ordered dinner. "I am very sorry that I cannot accommodate you, Sir," said the hostess, "but everything we have in the house has been bespoke by a gentleman who arrived a few minutes before you."—"Go up stairs," said the traveller, "and tell your guest I shall be obliged to him if he will permit me to share his dinner, and I will defray my portion of the expense." The hostess delivered the message to the first traveller, who politely replied, "Tell the gentleman I shall be glad of his company, but that it is not my practice to accept payment from persons whom I invite to dine with me." The second traveller accordingly went up stairs, and, having expressed his acknowledgments for the kind reception he had experienced, they both sat down to table. The dinner was as cheerful as could be expected, considering the short acquaintance of the parties; but during the dessert, when some excellent wine was placed before them, the conversation became more unrestrained, and the second traveller ventured to ask his obliging Amphytrion what had brought him to that part of the country, where he appeared to be a stranger. "I have been ordered here," he replied, "by the cardinal" [de Richelieu].—"By the cardinal!" resumed his companion, in a tone of surprise. "Pardon my curiosity, Sir, if I inquire whether you suppose you have given his eminence any offence?"—"By no means," replied the first traveller; "and it is to free myself from any such imputation, that I have come here. The fact is, there has been published at Rochelle, my native town, a virulent satire upon the public conduct and personal character of the cardinal, several copies of which have been addressed to the king; and though I never in my life wrote a single word that has appeared in print, I am unjustly accused of being the author of this pamphlet. Nothing obtains such ready belief as the whisperings of folly and ill-nature; and I have therefore lost no time in obeying the summons of his eminence, in the hope of effectually refuting the absurd charge that has been brought against me."—"Sir," said his companion, with an expression of marked anxiety, "return thanks to providence for the fortunate accident which has introduced me to you to-day. I also have been summoned hither by the cardinal, and for no other purpose, I am convinced, than that of beheading you!" A thrill of horror passed through the frame of the person to whom these words were addressed. "Yes, sir," resumed the speaker, "I again say, my task would have been to behead you. I am the executioner of a neighbouring town; and whenever the cardinal has any secret act of vengeance to perform, I receive orders to repair to the castle. The particulars I have just heard you relate, together with the hour of your appointment here, all convince me, beyond a doubt, that you are marked out as a victim. But fear nothing; I will secure your escape. Order your horse instantly, and go with me. I will acquit myself of the debt of gratitude which your courtesy has imposed on me."

The horror and alarm of the poor traveller may be more easily conceived than described. He instantly ordered the horses to be saddled, and having paid the bill, he and his companion set out, taking a private way through the wood of Bretard. "Do you see," said his guide, as they approached the castle, "that grated window which almost reaches the crannies of the central turret? In that dungeon sentences, against which there is no appeal, are pronounced and executed, and the mutilated bodies of the victims are hurled into the moat below, where they are speedily destroyed by quicklime. Neglect not to observe my instructions. Conceal yourself behind that hedge; and if, within the space of an hour, you see a light glimmering at the window which I have pointed out, then you may conclude that I am ordered here to execute vengeance on another; but if, on the contrary, you see no light, rely on it that you yourself are the intended victim. In that case, lose not a moment. Profit by the darkness of the night and the swiftness of your horse. Gain the frontier, and then plead your cause as you think fit. But permit me to tell you, that it is absurd to seek to justify yourself against the imputation of an offence which you have not committed; for, where despotism reigns, law and justice are powerless." Having expressed unbounded gratitude to his tutelary saint, the traveller withdrew to his hiding-place. The suspicions of the cardinal's agent were correct. No light appeared at the window of the turret; and at the expiration of the hour the traveller galloped off. He immediately quitted France, and did not venture back until after the death of the cardinal. On returning to his native country, his first business was to visit the inn of Ruelle, and to make enquiries respecting his benefactor, who, however, had not been seen or heard of for several years. He then related his adventure, which has since become a local tradition, and has conferred celebrity on the inn of Ruelle, known by the name of the Cheval Blanc. The room in which the two travellers dined is shown to this day, and is called la salle de bon secours.—Journal of a Nobleman.

ANECDOTE OF THE FIRST FRENCH REVOLUTION.

After supper I again joined the Prince de Ligne, whom I met in one of the ball-rooms, admiring the dancing of some of the ladies of the tournament. "Observe," said I to him, "how beautiful the Countess Rezewouski looks this evening: the elegance of her dress is rivalled only by the charms and graces of her person."—"To see her surrounded by all this splendour and happiness," said the Prince, "you would not suppose her to be the heroine of one of the most extraordinary adventures of this extraordinary age; but I can assure you that a prison was her cradle, and a poor laundress's garret her first school." As I expressed some surprise on hearing this, he added, drawing me aside, "Come this way, and I will relate to you an episode of her life, which I have heard twenty times from her own lips.—At that period of the reign of terror, when France was covered with scaffolds, Princess Fanny Lubomirska, who was as celebrated for beauty as she was illustrious by birth, resided in Paris. She had with her her only daughter Rosalie, who was then five years of age; and for her safety she confidently relied on the sacred law of nations. She was, however, denounced to the revolutionary committee, on the charge of conspiring against the republic, and arraigned before that sanguinary tribunal: to be suspected, accused, and condemned to death, was in a few days the fate of the unfortunate victim. During her imprisonment in the Conciergerie she was separated from all her servants, but she was allowed to have her daughter with her; and the day on which she was carried to the scaffold, she recommended Rosalie to the care of some of her fellow-prisoners. But the latter, in their turns, speedily experienced the same fate as the Princess, and left Rosalie as a dying bequest to their companions in misfortune. The poor child was at length consigned to the charitable care of the laundress of the prison, whose name was Bertot. This poor woman, though she had five children of her own to maintain, generously took charge of the poor orphan, and removed her from the prison to her own obscure lodging. Rosalie, who was now consigned to a sphere of life very different from that which fate had marked out for her, was alike remarkable for her beauty and amiable disposition. She diligently assisted her benefactress in her domestic occupations, and her adopted mother cherished the same affection for her as for her own children. The reign of blood had ceased, and the list of the victims, which was at that period published throughout Europe, informed the friends of the Countess, that in a country which was called free, an illustrious Polish lady had paid the forfeit of her head for her imprudent confidence in a misguided people.

On being made acquainted with the horrible intelligence, Count Rezewouski, the princess's brother, hastened to Paris, where, with the assistance of the magisterial authorities, he actively endeavoured to discover the daughter of his unfortunate sister. For several weeks, however, his efforts were unavailing: advertisements, promises of reward, nothing had been neglected. But the advertisements never reached the eye of the poor laundress, and the jailer of the Conciergerie, the only person who could give him any account of the orphan, was dead, and had had two successors. The count almost relinquished every hope of attaining his object, and began to fear that misery had hastened the death of his niece. However, Rosalie's trials were drawing to a close: it happened that the laundress of the Conciergerie, also washed for the hotel Grange Batelliere, where the count had put up on his arrival at Paris. One morning, when Rosalie, accompanied by her adopted mother, brought home some linen to the hotel, the count saw her as she crossed the court-yard. He was struck with her beauty, and thought he could trace in her features some resemblance to those of his sister. "What is your name, my little girl?" said he. "Rosalie."—"Rosalie!" repeated the count, with surprise. "My good woman," continued he, addressing himself to the laundress, is this your child?"—"I might say she is mine, sir, for I have brought her up since she was five years old: however, I am not her mother, she is the daughter of a lady, who died a prisoner in the Conciergerie, and she has now neither father nor mother."—"A lady, who was a prisoner in the Conciergerie?"—"Yes, sir, and a lady of quality, too; but she was guillotined like many others, by Robespierre." The count no longer doubted that his niece stood before him. He immediately addressed Rosalie in the Polish language, the accents of which revived all the impressions of her childhood. She burst into tears, and running into the arms of the count, she exclaimed, "I understand you, sir, I understand you, that is the language that my mother used to speak!" The count pressed the child to his bosom, saying, "Have I at length found thee, Rosalie! the child of my beloved sister!" Then turning to the laundress, who stood motionless with surprise, he said, "Bertot, continue still to be her mother—she shall not leave you. She has been a part of your family,—you shall henceforth be a part of hers. Rosalie shall now begin to share her bettered fortune with you!" With these words he put into her hand a purse of gold, and desired her to remove, with her children, to the hotel Grange Batelliere. A few days afterwards he left Paris to return to Poland, whither Bertot and her family accompanied Rosalie. The children of the laundress were brought up under the eyes of the Count. The boys were placed at the University of Wilna, and afterwards having entered the Polish army, they became the aides-de-camp of Prince Poniatowski; and the girls, to whom handsome portions were given, married Polish gentlemen. The beautiful Countess Rosalie, who is very naturally the object of your admiration, married her cousin, Count Rezewouski. Since, happiness has spread its golden veil over her destiny: her benefactress, the estimable Bertot, continues to reside with her, and the Countess, who loves her as a mother, calls her her Providence." This, added the Prince, is an anecdote that deserves to be engraven on the hearts of all women.—The same.

NAPOLEON A FORMIDABLE PLAYMATE.

After making a few visits, we called on Isabey, to see his fine collection of portraits * * * * I saw also a likeness of the Prince de Ligne, animated by all the fine expression of the original, and a full-length of Napoleon himself, walking in the gardens of Malmaison. "Then he really had the habit of walking with his arms crossed in this manner?" said I.—"Unquestionably," replied Isabey, "and that, together with his other remarkable habit of stooping his head, at one time well nigh proved fatal to me. During the consulate, I had been dining one day with some of Bonaparte's young aides-de-camp at Malmaison. After dinner, we went on the lawn fronting the château, to play at leap-frog: you know that was a favourite college game of ours. I had leaped over the heads of several of my companions, when, a little further on, between an avenue of trees, I saw another, apparently waiting for me, in the requisite position. Thinking I had not yet completed my task, I ran forward, but unfortunately missed my mark, springing only to the height of his neck. I knocked him down, and we both rolled along the grass to the distance of at least ten yards. What was my horror on discovering that the victim of my unlucky blunder was no other than Bonaparte himself! At that period he had not even dreamed of the possibility of a fall; and this first lesson was naturally calculated to rouse his indignation to the utmost degree. Foaming with rage, he drew his sword, and had I not proved myself a better runner than a leaper, I have no doubt but he would soon have made an end of me. He pursued me as far as the ditch, which I speedily cleared, and fortunately for me, he did not think fit to follow my example. I proceeded straight to Paris, and so great was my alarm, that I scarcely ventured to look behind me until I reached the gates of the Tuileries. I immediately ascended to Madame Bonaparte's apartments, for the persons of the household were accustomed to admit me at all times. On seeing my agitation, Josephine at first concluded that I was the bearer of some fatal news. I related my adventure, which, in spite of my distress, appeared to her so irresistibly comic, that she burst into a fit of laughter. When her merriment had somewhat subsided, she promised, with her natural kindness of heart, to intercede with the Consul in my behalf. But knowing her husband's irascible temper, she advised me to keep out of the way, until she should have an opportunity of appeasing him, which to her was no very difficult task, for at that time Napoleon loved her most tenderly. Indeed her angelic disposition always gave her a powerful ascendancy over him, and she was frequently the means of averting those acts of violence to which his ungovernable temper would otherwise have driven him. On my return home, I found lying on my table an order not to appear again at the Tuileries; and it was during my temporary retirement that I finished the portrait you were just now looking at. Madame Bonaparte, on presenting it to the Consul, obtained my pardon, and my recall to court. The first time Bonaparte saw me after this affair was in Josephine's apartments, and, stepping up to me goodnaturedly, he patted me on the cheek, saying, "Really, Sir, if people will play tricks, they ought at least to do them cleverly."—"Mon Dieu," said Josephine laughing, "if you had seen his look of terror when he first presented himself to me, you would have thought him sufficiently punished for his intended feat of agility."—The same.

LOVE CHANGING SIDES.

Count Pletenberg was enjoined by his uncle's will to marry, before he had completed his twenty-fifth year, a young lady of noble descent; and if he failed to do this, he was to forfeit the whole inheritance which, fulfilling that condition, he was to enjoy. Being reminded of this clause in the will, by his steward, at a period when he had no time to lose, the count commenced a diligent search after a bride. All his friends were set to work, and after a few days' search, their choice fell upon Mademoiselle Adelaide de Gallemberg. The decayed fortunes of the young lady's family made the proposal a desirable one, and, accordingly, the preliminaries were settled without delay; after which, the count repaired to Neustadt to pay his respects to his future spouse, who was still in a convent there for the completion of her education. Adelaide was only fifteen; it had been intimated to her that she was to be immediately united to a handsome young man, possessing an immense fortune, and with it, sovereign power;—her imagination had been so much excited by these representations, that she became deeply enamoured of the count, the first moment she saw him. Notwithstanding her extreme beauty, however, the count himself considered the union only as an affair of necessity. Soon after his marriage, therefore, he left his wife under the care of her governess, and the guidance of her mother. He plunged into every kind of dissipation, gloried in his excesses, and openly exulted in his unfeeling conduct towards his young and lovely wife. She suffered without complaint, and answered only by tears to the consolations offered her. By the exercise of every domestic virtue, by resignation, and the most devoted attachment, she hoped in time to win the heart, of the possession of which she thought herself deserving. But her hopes were vain; and rather than continue to endure the wretchedness of beholding every day the man who made so cold a return to her affections, she solicited and obtained his permission, at the age of eighteen, to retire to one of his estates in Bohemia. Misfortune operates on elevated minds, as the storm does on the atmosphere, which it purifies. During the many years that she lived in this solitude, she devoted herself to the continual exercises of piety and charity. The count, having exhausted every enjoyment that Vienna could afford, travelled in search of new ones. Thus fourteen years elapsed; when at last Count Pletenberg became weary of his dissipated life, and thought of his country and his wife. He repaired to Bohemia, and beheld once more the woman to whom he had been united by the most sacred vows. He found the countess still in her bloom. Time and reflection had soothed her sorrows; and in the tranquil life she had led, her personal charms had preserved their primitive freshness. The most extraordinary part of the story is, that Pletenberg now fell desperately in love with his wife. But time had operated very differently on the countess; her tenderness was changed to aversion. His dissolute habits had been regularly reported to her, by those who wished that they might produce on her their due impression; and it was to no purpose that the count now resorted to every demonstration of repentance, affection, and sincerity. She remained insensible to his entreaties, and to the solicitations of her friends that she would consent to a reconciliation. The count urged a visit to Vienna, in the hope that in the tumult of festivity, her heart would more easily open itself again to that feeling, which formerly it cherished. She consented to accompany him, and even to take part with him in all the gaieties which now abound in this splendid capital; but she continues insensible to all the demonstrations of his affection, and seems to look upon their present fruitless ardour, as a punishment of which he has no right to complain. The poor man has become an object of ridicule by the servile excess of his devotion. Always sighing as at the age of eighteen, and as jealous as a sexagenarian, he never moves from her side. He is ever taking up her gloves, her handkerchief, &c., and pressing them to his bosom in public. But all this tends to increase the aversion he has raised. Proscribed from the nuptial bed, which he had so long disdained, he complains of this rigour in prose, and laments his fate in verse. In short, his enthusiasm has become so great, that if it continues for any length of time, his intellects must become affected by it. You now understand the origin of the extreme paleness in the lady's countenance, which so much attracted your notice. In her situation, there is something infinitely more natural in the settled melancholy her face evinces, than in a more animated expression —Abridged from the Journal of a Nobleman.

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

— Napoleon related that a few days before the battle of Austerlitz, some agitation had prevailed, particularly in Paris. "The warmth of the court party," said he, "had fallen to temperate; but on hearing of my success, they rallied round me as if they had been charged by the Cossacks. This is the way of the world."—Madame Campan.

— It was a saying of Napoleon's, that if you but scratched the skin of a Russian, you would instantly discern the barbarian.

ANECDOTE OF CURRAN.—One day, when it was known that Curran was to make an elaborate speech in Chancery, Lord Clare (the then Chancellor of Ireland) brought a large Newfoundland dog upon the bench with him; and during the progress of the argument he leant his ear much more to the dog than to the barrister. At last, the Chancellor seemed to lose all regard to decency; he turned himself quite aside in the most material part of the case, and begun in full court to fondle the animal. Curran stopped short. "Go on, go on, Mr Curran," said Lord Clare. "Oh," replied Curran, "I beg a thousand pardons, my lord; I really took it for granted that your lordship was employed in consultation."

MISSIONARIES IN OTAHEITE.—It is painful to contemplate the great change which has taken place in the habits of the natives of Otaheite since the Missionaries have been established there. Kotzebue and Captain Beechey both represent the change as a melancholy one; and whatever good may have been effected by their influence, in the prevention of theft, &c. seems infinitely overbalanced by the mischief they have done in other respects. The persons who have settled there as Missionaries, appeared to have been mere fanatics, having no other object in view than to acquire power by the inspiration of fear. The people, formerly cheerful and happy, are now melancholy and demure. The most innocent recreations are forbidden them; their dramatic amusements, their singing, dancing, &c. have wholly ceased. Some English Missionaries (of which there are now six residing in the island) contrived to gain over the King, who then governed in peace and tranquillity, but, under the influence of these mistaken men, the King gave orders for the destruction of every memorial of the former worship; the new religion was by order established, and every one who would not embrace it was put to death. "Streams of blood flowed, whole races were exterminated," says Kotzebue; "many resolutely met the death they preferred to the renunciation of their ancient faith. Some few escaped by flight to the recesses of the lofty mountains, where they still live in seclusion, faithful to the gods of their ancestors." When the King had thus forced upon his subjects what he called Christianity, he was smitten with an ambition of conquest, that he might force it upon the neighbouring islands also; but his schemes failed; he was not only repulsed, but, after some successes, conquered by Pomareh, the young King of Tabua, who "offered the zealot murderer of his innocent subjects as a sacrifice to their manes." After the death of Pomareh, his successor being yet in his infancy, the Missionaries contrived to get the power entirely into their own hands, and are to be considered rather as fanatical tyrants than religious or moral instructors. "The religion taught by these Missionaries is not true Christianity. That it was established by force, is of itself an evidence against its Christian principle. A religion which consists in the eternal repetition of prescribed prayers, which forbids every innocent pleasure, and cramps or annihilates every mental power, is a libel on the Divine Founder of Christianity, the Benign Friend of human kind." Both the travellers above-mentioned speak at some length on this subject, and agree in lamenting the melancholy change produced. Their representations are interesting, but too long to extract. The following mode of spending the Sunday is from Kotzebue's 'New Voyage round the World,' in 1823, &c. He first describes the beauty of the morning, and his surprise at the deadly stillness that reigned on shore, "At length we obtained, from the boat sent off to us at break of day with provisions, an explanation of this enigma. The inhabitants of Tahaiti (Otaheite) were celebrating the Sunday, on which account they did not leave their houses, where they lay on their bellies, reading the Bible and howling aloud; laying aside every species of occupation, they devoted, as they said, the whole day to prayer."—The Captain goes on shore.—"The loud prayer of the Tahaiti Christians reached my ears as I approached their habitations. All the doors were closed, and not even the children allowed to enjoy the beauty of the morning."—In another part of his work this writer says—"Wilson (one of the Missionaries) was originally a common sailor, but has zealously devoted himself to theology. * * * * * * Besides the English Missionaries, some native Tahaitians, after receiving a suitable education, are sent to spread Christianity among the islands of the dangerous Archipelago. In Russia, a careful education, and diligent study at schools and universities, is necessary to qualify any one to be a teacher of religion. The London Missionary Society is more easily satisfied; a half-savage, confused by the dogmas of an uneducated sailor, is, according to them, perfectly fitted for the sacred office."

A GALLANT INFORMER.—A diligence on the point of passing the French frontiers, to enter a neighbouring kingdom, where several articles of French manufacture were not admitted, a lady, who was one of the passengers, had a fine lace veil concealed about her person. One of the passengers who had smuggled articles to a large amount with him, unknown to any of the other passengers, on alighting entered the custom-house, and informed against the lady, who in consequence lost her veil. On resuming their seats the informer was most violently assailed by all the passengers for what he had done. When they had reached a considerable distance from the frontier, the informer enquired of the lady the value of her loss. "Nearly a hundred louis," said she—"monster that you are!" He then gave the lady one of the value of a thousand crowns, informing her that his denunciation had turned aside all suspicion from himself. The fair traveller was delighted, and cried out, in which all the other passengers joined, Charmant Voleur!

EXTRACT FROM COWPER'S LETTERS.—In the Memoirs of Fuseli, lately published, it is said that he corrected the sheets of Cowper's translation of the Iliad. In one of the poet's letters, printed in Mr Hayley's life of him, this circumstance is mentioned: "I know not whether I told you before, or now tell you for the first time, that I am in the hands of a very extraordinary person. He is intimate with my bookseller, and voluntarily offered his service. I was at first doubtful whether to accept it or not, but finding that my friends abovesaid were not to be satisfied on any other terms, though myself a perfect stranger to the man and his qualifications, except as he was recommended by Johnson, I at length consented, and have since found great reason to rejoice that I did. I call him an extraordinary person, and such he is. For he is not only versed in Homer, and accurate in his knowledge of the Greek to a degree that entitles him to that appellation, but, though a foreigner, is a perfect master of our language, and has exquisite taste in English poetry. By his assistance, I have improved many passages, supplied many oversights, and corrected many mistakes, such as will of course escape the most diligent and attentive labourer in such a work. I ought to add, because it affords the best assurance of his zeal and fidelity, that he does not toil for hire, nor will accept of any premium, but has entered on this business merely for his amusement. * * * * * F. does me the honour to say that the most difficult and the most interesting parts of the poem are admirably rendered. But because he did not express himself equally pleased with the more pedestrian parts of it, my labour has been principally given to the dignification of them."

AN EXTRAORDINARY FACT.—Kotzebue, speaking of the Mission of Santa Clare, in California, after mentioning a large store, a spacious dwelling-house for the monks, large gardens, and a large magazine for the preservation of corn, goes on to speak of the barracks in which the Indian families are lodged, "where each family is allowed a space scarcely large enough to enable them to lie down to repose." He then proceeds to describe a building, without any windows on the outside, and with only one safely closed door, which resembled a prison; and this, he says,—"proved to be the residence appropriated by the monks, the severe guardians of chastity, to the young unmarried Indian women, whom they keep under their peculiar superintendence, making their time useful to the community by spinning, weaving, and similar occupations. These dungeons are opened two or three times a day, but only to allow the prisoners to pass to and from the church. I have occasionally seen the poor girls rushing out eagerly to breathe the fresh air, and driven immediately into the church like a flock of sheep, by an old ragged Spaniard armed with a stick. After mass, they are, in the same manner, hurried back to their prisons. Yet, notwithstanding all the care of the ghostly fathers, the feet of some of these uninviting fair ones were cumbered with bars of iron, the penal consequence, as I was informed, of detected transgression. Only on their marriage are these cloistered virgins allowed to issue from their confinement, and associate with their own people in the barracks. Three times a-day a bell summons the Indians to their meals, which are prepared in large kettles, and served out in portions to each family. They are seldom allowed meat; their ordinary and not very wholesome food consisting of wheaten flour, maize, peas, and beans, mixed together and boiled to a thick soup. The mission of Santa Clara contains 1500 male Indians, of whom about one half are married. All these men are governed by three monks, and guarded by four soldiers and a subaltern officer. Since this force is found sufficient, it follows either that the Indians of the mission are happier than their free countrymen, or that, no way superior to the domestic animals, they are chained by their instincts to the place where their food is provided. The first supposition can hardly be well founded. Hard labour every day, Sundays only excepted, when labour is superseded by prayer; corporal chastisement, imprisonment, and fetters on the slightest demonstration of disobedience; unwholesome nourishment, miserable lodging, deprivation of all property, and of all the enjoyments of life. These are not boons which diffuse content. Many, indeed, of these unfortunate victims prove, by their attempts to escape, that their submission is involuntary; but the soldiers, as I have before observed, generally hunt them from their place of refuge, and bring them back to undergo the severe punishment their transgression has incurred. To the most stupid apathy, then, must the patience of these Indians be ascribed; and in this distinguishing characteristic, they exceed every race of men I have ever known, not excepting the degraded natives of Terra del Fuego, or Van Dieman's Land.—Kotzebue's New Voyage.

Out of a few notes, great musicians make a wonderful variety of sweet sounds. It not seldom happens, that the fewer they are, the more original the composition. Dramatists are not in the habit of surprising us with an equal diversity in the treatment of characters. If you see a footman, for instance, in a play, you know directly what relationship he stands in with his master, and his master's mistress's maid:—if an old hunks, there is a ward; and if a testy old gentleman, there is a young one to plague him.

Happening the other night to see the conclusion of a little piece, the announcement of which we had overlooked, we last night went to see the rest of it, being curious to know whether it was possible for the author to give us anything about an aunt, a niece, and a gallant colonel, that we had not witnessed before: for of such materials is this new trifle composed. We found two additions,—one, pleasant enough, to wit, a good-humoured grandmother, who pretends not to know to which of the three the Colonel is making love; the other not so agreeable,—a fondness for talking in sea metaphor, on the part of the aunt, who we presume (though we did not observe it) is the widow of a sea-captain. Miss WELLS performs the part of the grandmother very well; and Mrs GLOVER makes, as usual, an admirable jovial plenitude of an aunt.

For the rest, this very little piece (Three to One) is a mere butterfly; and we certainly shall not break it upon the wheel.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

MONDAY, APRIL 25, 1831.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

The Edinburgh Review for March 1831. Longman.

We have not read this number through. We take occasion to observe that there is an excellent article in it, on Mr William Taylor's 'Historic Survey of German Poetry,' which, with many compliments to the author, throws great doubts on the profundity of his views of the subject; not, however, without leaving upon us a strong desire to consult Mr Taylor's book for ourselves. What we mention the Review for, however, at the present moment, is to take one of the old unreviewing licenses, of which it set the example, and in reference to its usual political article, congratulate our readers on the great and gallant measure which has just taken place. We have reason perhaps for being delighted with it beyond the delight of most; for, thorough-going reformers as we are, and prepared to abide by the good cause through all chances and perils, we have as great a dislike of convulsion as the most timid of the acquiescent, and we have felt great uneasiness for some weeks past, lest this dissolution should not take place; for we are persuaded, that if it had not, there would have been bloodshed, and that very speedily. The public have been startled by witnessing the vagaries of certain lords and others, who have been getting "more and more absurd every minute," and calling their betters fools. If some of these lavishers 'of their own title, who furthermore have called the people mad, and who have claimed a right of laughing at the poor and famished, had been seen in public the second day after it had been certain that there would be no dissolution, we verily believe it probable, that before they could have well had time to put off their stupid pride, and cry out for mercy, and before their assailants had time to think of the excesses they were committing, they would have been torn out of their carriages, and reduced to shapeless lumps. It is horrible to think of the mischief they would have done to themselves, to their assailants, and to the whole English community; and we rejoice to think, that like proper madmen, they have been guarded against themselves. The success of Reform, as we before stated, we hold to have been inevitable under any circumstances. The dissolution will only make it smoother to all parties; non-dissolution would have made it uneasy to all, and personally fatal to many. We rejoice to think there is now no danger of this. The King, the People, and the Army are united; and though it was in the last possible degree of bad taste, convicted silliness, and conscious iniquity, that the corruptionists raged and howled as they did the other day, and ran their fists into the air, we felt, after the first movement of indignation, nothing but an inclination to laugh; and the next thing to laughter is good humour, and a wish to put aside the criminal gently. We trust that this will be the scale of the feeling, when the delinquents shall next make their appearance; first indignation, then laughter, then the putting them aside with inflexible tranquillity.

The Life of Sir Humphrey Davy, Bart. LL.D. late President of the Royal Society, Foreign Associate of the Royal Institute of France, &c. &c. &c. By John Ayrton Paris, M.D. Cantab. F.R.S. &c. Fellow of the Royal College of Physicians. 2 vols. 8vo. Colburn and Bentley.

(Concluded.)

We cannot give a better idea of the importance of Sir Humphrey Davy's most popular discovery, The Safety-Lamp, than by laying before the reader the following account of the appalling circumstances which instigated the enquiry. To read this dreadful narrative, to think of the violent and mortal perils which so many human beings had undergone, and but for this invention were hereafter to undergo; and then to see one other human being, upon the strength of his superior knowledge, descending into these awful regions under ground, and putting an end to the perils, by simply hanging up a lamp, gives us a sense of the beneficent wonders of science, no less stupendous than just. Two considerations strike us, when we have recovered a little from our surprise; first, the shallness of the means which wisdom has in store for the attainment of the mightiest ends, thus annihilating, as it were, the giants of fire and earthquake, by the lighting up of a taper: and second, the probability, that when the cultivation of science is more extended, the discovery of means equally simple and amazing will be within the reach of a far greater number of understandings than the present. And this latter reflection may serve to reconcile us to a diminution of our wonder at the faculties of the men themselves; for the greater their number, the luckier will be the world.

'That the benefits conferred upon mankind by the labours of Sir Humphrey Davy may be properly appreciated, it is necessary to describe the magnitude of the evil which his genius has removed, as well as the numerous difficulties which opposed his efforts and counteracted his designs.

'The great coal field, the scene of those awful accidents which will be hereafter described, extends over a considerable part of the counties of Northumberland and Durham. The whole surface has been calculated at one hundred and eighty square miles, and the number of different beds of coal has been stated to exceed forty; many of which, however, are insignificant in point of dimensions. The two most important are about six feet in thickness, and are distinguished by the names of High main, and Low main, the former being about sixty fathoms above the latter.

'From this statement some idea may be formed of the great extent of the excavations, and of the consequent difficulty of successfully ventilating the mines. In some collieries, they are continued for many miles, forming numerous windings and turnings, along which the pitmen have frequently to walk for forty or fifty minutes, before they arrive at the workings; during which time, as well as when at work, they have no direct communication with the surface of the earth. The most ingenious machinery, however, has been contrived for conducting pure air through every part of the mine, and for even ventilating the old excavations, which are technically called wastes; and unless some obstruction occur, the plan so far answers, as to furnish wholesome air to the pitmen; and to diminish,—although, from reasons to be hereafter stated, it can never wholly prevent, the dangers of fire-damp; the nature of which it will be necessary to consider.

'The whole appears to part with a portion of carburetted hydrogen, when newly exposed to the atmosphere; a fact which explains the well-known circumstance of the coal being more inflammable when fresh from the pit, than after long exposure to the air. We are informed by the Rev. Mr Hodgson, that, on pounding some common Newcastle coal fresh from the mine, in a cask furnished with a small aperture, he found the gas which issued from it to be inflammable; and Davy, on breaking some lumps of coal under water, also ascertained that they gave off inflammable gas. The supposition that the coal strata have been formed under a pressure greater than that of the atmosphere, may furnish a clue to the comprehension of this phenomenon.

'On some occasions the pitmen have opened with their picks crevices, or fissures, in the coal or shale, which have emitted as much as seven hundred hogsheads of fire-damp in a minute. These Blowers have been known to continue in a state of activity for many months, or even years together, a phenomenon which clearly shows that the carburetted hydrogen must have existed in the cavities of the strata in a very highly compressed, if not actually in a liquid state, and which, on the diminution of pressure, has resumed its elastic form.

'All the sources of carburetted hydrogen would appear to unite in the deep and valuable collieries situated between the great north road and the sea. Their air courses are thirty or forty miles in length; and here, as might be expected, the most tremendous explosions have happened. Old workings likewise, upon being broken into, have not unfrequently been found filled with this gas, and which, by mingling itself with the common air, has converted the whole atmosphere of the mine into a magazine of fire-damp.

'On the approach of a candle, it is in an instant kindled: the expanding fluid drives before it a roaring whirlwind of flaming air, which tears up everything in its progress, scorching some of the miners to a cinder, and burying others under enormous ruins shaken from the roof; when thundering to the shafts, it converts the mine, as it were, into an enormous piece of artillery, and wastes its fury in a discharge of thick clouds of coal-dust, stones and timber, together with the limbs, and mangled bodies of men and horses.'

But this first, though apparently the most appalling, is not the most destructive effect of these subterraneous combustions. All the stoppings und trap-doors of the mine being broken down by the violence of the concussion of the atmospheric current, entirely excluded from the workings, such of the miners as may have survived the discharge, are doomed to the more painful and lingering death of suffocation from the after damp, or stythe, which immediately results from the combustion, and occupies the vacuum necessarily produced by it.

'As the phenomena accompanying these explosions are always of the same description, to relate the numerous recorded histories of such accidents would be only to multiply pictures of death and human suffering, without an adequate object: it is, however, essential to the just comprehension of the subject, that the reader should receive, at least, one well-authenticated account, in all its terrific details; and I have accordingly selected that, which was originally drawn up with much accuracy and feeling by the Rev. John Hodgson, and which is prefixed to the funeral sermon preached on the occasion, and subsequently published by that gentleman.

'The accident occurred at Felling Colliery, near Sunderland, on the 25th of May, in the year 1712. This mine was considered by the workmen as a model of perfection, both with regard to the purity of its air, and the arrangements of its machinery. The concern was in the highest degree prosperous, and no accident, except a trifling explosion which slightly scorched two or three pitmen, had ever occurred.

'Two sets of men were constantly employed, the first of which entered the mine at four, and were relieved at their working posts by the next set at eleven o'clock in the morning; but such was the confidence of the pitmen in the safety of this mine, that the second set of men were often at their posts before the first had left them; and such happened to be the case on the following unhappy occasion.

'About half-past eleven, on the morning of the 25th of May, the neighbouring villages were alarmed by a tremendous explosion. The subterraneous fire broke forth with two heavy discharges from the shaft called the "John Pit," which was one hundred and two fathoms deep, and were almost immediately followed by one from that termed the "William Pit.' A slight trembling, as if from an earthquake, was felt for about half a mile around the workings; and the noise of the explosion, though dull, was heard to the distance of three or four miles, and greatly resembled an unsteady fire of infantry.

'Immense quantities of dust and small coal accompanied these blasts, and rose high into the air, in the form of an inverted cone. The heaviest part of the ejected matter, such as masses of timber and fragments of wall, fell near the pit, but the dust, borne away by a strong west wind, fell in a continued shower to the distance of a mile and a half; and in the village of Heworth it caused a gloom, like that of early twilight, and so covered the roads, that the footsteps of passengers were strongly imprinted on them.

'As soon as the explosion had been heard, the wives and children of the pitmen rushed to the working pit. Wildness and terror were pictured in every other countenance. The crowd thickened on every side, and in a very short period several hundred persons had collected together, and the air resounded with exclamations of despair for the fate of husbands, parents, and children.

'The machinery having been rendered useless by the eruption, the rope of the gin was sent down the shaft with all possible expedition. In the absence of horses, a number of men, who seemed to acquire strength as the necessity for it increased, applied their shoulders to the starts, or shafts of the gin, and worked it with astonishing expedition.

'By twelve o'clock thirty-two persons, all that survived this dreadful catastrophe, had been brought to day-light, but of these three boys lived only a few hours. The dead bodies of two boys, miserably scorched and shattered, were also brought up at the same time. Twenty-nine persons, then, were all who were left to relate what they had observed of the appearances and effect of the explosion. One hundred and twenty-one were in the mine when it happened, eighty-seven of whom remained in the workings.

'Those who had their friends restored, hastened with them from the scene of destruction, and for awhile appeared to suffer as much from excess of joy as they had a short time before from the depth of despair; while those who were yet in the agony of suspense filled the air with shrieks and howlings, and ran about ringing their hands and throwing their bodies into the most frantic and extravagant gestures.

'As not one of the pitmen had escaped from the mine by the only avenue open to them, the apprehension for their safety momentarily increased, and at a quarter after twelve o'clock nine persons descended the John pit, with the faint hope that some might still survive.

'As the fire-damp would have been instantly ignited by candles, they lighted their way by steel-mills; and knowing that a great number of miners must have been at the crane when the explosion happened, they at once attempted to reach that spot; their progress, however, was very soon intercepted by the progress of choak-damp, and the sparks from their steel-mills fell into it like dark drops of blood; deprived therefore of light, and nearly suffocated by the noxious atmosphere, they retraced their steps towards the shaft, but they were shortly stopped by a thick smoke, which stood like a wall before them. Here their steel-mills became entirely useless, and the chance of their ever finding any of their companions alive, entirely hopeless; to which should also be added, the horror arising from the conviction of the mine being on fire, and the probability of the second explosion occurring at the next moment, and of their being buried in the ruins it would occasion.

'At two o'clock five of the intrepid persons who had thus nobly volunteered their assistance, ascended; two were still in the shaft, and the other two remained below, when a second explosion, much less severe, however, than the first, excited among the relatives of those entombed in the mine still more frightful expressions of grief and despair. The persons in the shaft experienced but little inconvenience from this fresh eruption, while those below, on hearing the distant growlings, immediately threw themselves flat on their faces, and in this posture, by keeping a firm hold on a strong wooden prop, they felt no other annoyance from the blast than that of having their bodies tossed in various directions, in the manner that a buoy is heaved by the waves of the sea. As soon as the atmospheric current returned down the shaft, they were safely drawn to the light.

'As each came up he was surrounded by a group of anxious enquirers: but not a ray of hope could be elicited; and the second explosion so strongly corroborated their account of the impure state of the mine, that their assertions for the present seemed to obtain credit. This impression, however, was but of short duration — hope still lingered; they recollected that persons had survived similar accidents, and that, upon opening the mine, they had been found alive after considerable intervals. Three miners, for instance, had been shut up in a pit near Byker, and during the whole of that period, subsisted on candles and horse beans. Persons too were not wanting to agitate the minds of the relatives. It was suggested to them that want of courage or bribery might have induced them to magnify the danger, and to represent the impossibility of approaching or reaching the bodies of the unfortunate sufferers. By this species of wicked industry, the grief of the neighbourhood began to change its gloomy, for an irritable aspect. The proposition to exclude the atmospheric air from the mine, in order to extinguish the fire, was received with the cries of Murder! —and with the determination to oppose such a proceeding by violence.

'Many of the widows lingered about the mouth of the pit during the whole of the night with the hope of hearing the cries of a husband or son.

'On Tuesday the 26th, that natural propensity in the human mind to derive gratification from spectacles of horror, was exemplified in a very striking manner. An immense crowd of colliers from various parts, but more especially from the banks of the river Wear, assembled around the pit, and were clamorous in their reproaches of the persons concerned in the management of the mine, accusing them of want of perseverance in their attempts to rescue the unhappy sufferers. Every one had some successful adventure to relate; all were liberal in their professions of readiness to give assistance; but not one was found hardy enough to enter the jaws of the burning cavern.

'The leaders of this outcry, however, were soon brought to listen with patience to a relation of the circumstances of the explosion, and of the reasons for concluding that the mine was then actually on fire, and the persons enclosed in it beyond the hope of recovery. They very candidly allowed, after this explanation, the impracticability of any attempt to reach the bodies of the sufferers, until the fire was extinguished; and they accordingly urged the propriety of excluding from the mine the access of air, as the only means of accomplishing the object. At the same time, the proprietors gave the strongest assurances to the multitude, that if any project could be devised for the recovery of their friends, no cost or labour should be spared in executing it, that, if any person could be found willing to enter the mine, every assistance should be afforded him; but, as they were assured by the most eminent viewers that the workings were inaccessible, they would not hold out any reward for the attempt,—they would not be accessary to the death of any one, either by persuasion or bribery.

'At the solicitation of the populace, two persons again descended the shaft, and very nearly lost their lives. The report of these men, in a great measure, convinced the people of the impossibility of their friends' survival in so deadly an atmosphere, and they agreed on excluding the air. The operation was commenced, and proceeded without interruption; but from various accidents, more than a month elapsed before the mine was in a state to admit of examination; and during this interval, numerous were the idle tales which had been circulated through the country. Several of the sufferers, it was said, had found their way to the shafts, and been recovered. Their number even, had been circumstantially told—how they had subsisted on candles, oats, and beans; and how they had heard the different persons who explored the mine in the hope of rescuing them.

'Some conjuror, too, it was said, had set his spells and divinations to work, and had penetrated all the secrets of the mine. He had discovered one famishing group, receiving drops of water from the roof, another eating their shoes and clothes, and many other similar pictures of horror. These inventions were carefully related to the widows, and they produced the effect of daily harrowing up afresh their sorrows; indeed, it seemed the chief employment of some to indulge in a kind of insane sport with their own and their neighbours' calamity.

'The morning of Wednesday, the 8th of July, having been appointed for exploring the workings, the distress of the neighbourhood was again renewed: at an early hour a great concourse of people assembled; some, out of curiosity, to witness the commencement of an undertaking full of sadness and danger,—some to excite the revenge, or to aggravate the sorrows of the relatives, by calumnies and reproaches, for the sole purpose of mischief; but the greater part came with broken hearts, and streaming eyes, in expectation of seeing the mangled corpse of a father, brother, husband, or son.

'The shifts of men employed in this doleful and unwholesome work were generally about eight in number. They were four hours in, and eight hours out of the mine; so that each individual wrought two shifts every twenty-four hours.

'When the first shift of men came up, a message was dispatched for a number of coffins, to be in readiness at the mouth of the pit. Ninety-two had been prepared, and they had passed by the village of Low Fellingly in their way to the mine. As soon as the cart-load of them were seen, the howling of the women, who, hitherto secluded in their dwellings, had now begun to assemble about their doors, came on the breeze in slow, fitful gusts, which presaged a scene of the greatest distress and confusion.

'The bodies were found under various circumstances: one miner, from his position, must have been sleeping when the explosion happened, and had never opened his eyes. In one spot were found twenty-one bodies in ghastly confusion,—some like mummies, scorched as dry as if they had been baked; one wanted his head, another an arm; the scene was most terrific; the power of the fire was visible upon all, but its effects were very various; while some were almost torn to pieces, there were others who appeared as if they had sunk down overpowered by sleep.

'From the 8th of July to the 9th of September, the heart-rending scene of mothers and widows, examining the putrid bodies of their sons and husbands, for marks by which to know them, was daily renewed; but few were recognized by any personal mark. They were too much mangled and scorched to retain any of their features; their clothes, tobacco-boxes, and shoes, were, therefore, the only indications by which they could be identified.

'The total loss from this terrible accident was ninety-two pitmen; while forty widows, sixty girls, and twenty-six boys, comprising altogether one hundred and twenty-six persons, were thrown upon the benevolence of the public.'—Vol. II. p. 60.

PERFORMANCES OF SATURDAY NIGHT.

DRURY-LANE.—The Hypocrite—The Legion of Honour—And Turning the Tables
COVENT-GARDEN.—Azor and Zemira—And Neuha's Cave.

THE Theatres on Saturday night offered us nothing that we had not already noticed.

Accident, much against his will, has hitherto prevented the Editor from going to the Italian Opera, but he will commence his pleasant task there in the course of the week. Admirers as we are of some of our living English actors, and fond of a good comedy, (for it is seldom that even one character in a fine tragedy is properly performed,) we know of no theatrical pleasure equal to that of entering the King's Theatre, while some favourite singer is just commencing, and when the piece is good, and you know that a fine set of compositions is to come. Reformers though we be, we have no objection to any elegance of pleasure, nor do we grudge the selectest body of people their satisfactions, provided the general satisfaction is not forgotten. We are willing to submit ourselves to the soft ordinances of the dictators of evening dress: we like the understood tone of quiet, which prevails in the vestibules of this theatre: it pleaseth our shoe to find itself stepping on matting, as we enter it: we enjoy the urbane equality that prevails between pit and boxes, and the evidences thereof, that take place in their mutual recognitions and discourses. All we desire is, that the company should be happier than they are; or at least that they should not affect an indifference, beyond what they feel; for this is the unpleasantness at the Opera: the people there, instead of confining their superiority to what it ought to consist of, think it necessary to be superior to the very pleasures they come to enjoy. The natural candour of the sex will sometimes break through in the countenances of the females; and we must acquit the experience of the dowagers from giving way to this absurdity so much as the rest. Statesmen, and other persons who have thought at all, are apt to think the affectation unnecessary; but in passing down the side of the pit, and finding one-self, looking one after one, into the faces of the young gentlemen who stand leaning against the boxes, it is difficult not to wish, that somebody behind them would pull their hair, or from above them, would send down a bit of a chandelier on their heads, in order to put the insipid dignity of their countenances into a state fit to be moved. This is the worst of the English audiences at these operas. A great part come there, not because they like it, but because it is fashionable; that is to say, they follow because others lead, and yet assume in their looks the dignity of leaders. A parcel of sheep might as well draw up their heads, and affect to look something. Such is not the defect of English audiences in general. Their fault is, that where they are more sincere, they are apt to be less urbane in their intercourse. The best thing we have observed in them of late, is a greater willingness to be pleased with what they see on the stage; nay, a remarkable indulgence in that respect; which we cannot help attributing to the general progress of knowledge. This is a great step towards being pleased with the best things; but yet toleration is not enjoyment; and what makes the Italian Stage superior to any other, in point of pleasure, and the English perhaps the least so, is, that the ministers of the entertainment have the air of being pleased with it themselves, and look at the audience as if they reckoned upon their being pleased with them. Miss INVERARITY is the only English singer, of any celebrity, that has a manner of this kind; and she comes out of the Italian school. It is a credit to the public, that they have welcomed her so heartily. It looks, as if in proportion to their advance in knowledge, they were going to sympathize with the agreeable. Hitherto, they have certainly shewn not too much attachment to it. We know not what knowledge may effect for us in default of climate, nor what happy days, in every respect, the progress of liberal opinion has in store for us. But in none of the pleasurable arts have the English hitherto been equal to other polite nations. We omit poetry, which is not of necessity allied to them, in the ordinary sense of the word pleasure; and the powers of which all may appreciate who think and suffer: but for some default of sunshine, or of domestic comfort, or of genial nurture, or of just notions of wealth, or of the social in lieu of the dictatorial spirit, which has alienated us from the advantages attained to by other nations, our beloved countrymen have without doubt been egregiously defective on the score of enjoyment: want of enjoyment (except with profound thinkers, or very amiable people), produces a disinclination to see it in others; and hence arises that diffidence in trying to produce it, which becomes confounded with a proper modesty, and is the cause why some of our most popular singers have been mere nothings, compared with the Italian. On the Italian stage, even in England, you shall see an actress come forward, who, with pleasure in her eyes, a smiling mouth, and a voice with a rich breath in it, as if the heart were full, and the pleasure of the meeting was mutual, shall pour forth her notes of love and joy, without a suspicion that anybody can think ill of her for it; and the effect is enchanting. We have seen FODOR, who was not beautiful, put all who sat within a certain limit about her in a state of irrepressible pleasure, by the mere happiness of her smile, and the enjoyment with which she began to take her part in a duett. She was dipping her hand, at the time, into a basket of roses; we forget in what opera.

This truth, this gusto, this real feeling and the relish of it, is what PASTA carries into everything that she represents, whether pleasurable or otherwise exciting; and this it is that renders her so divine in all her characters.

When are we to see her again? ☞

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

TUESDAY, APRIL 26, 1831.

THE LATE MR ABERNETHY.

The death of this eminent surgeon, and preacher of dietetics, will perhaps give a new interest to a remark or so upon his "system," as it has been called, and his strange mode of enforcing it; and perhaps a reader, here and there, may take it into his head to benefit himself by reflecting on what we say: for as to the effect of maxims of health and diet upon people in general, men of sense not excepted, we believe that they are of little avail. The better physical condition of society must be produced, like the moral and intellectual, by those great changes in opinion and government, which include the whole well-being of man. The best thing to be done for weak wills and weak stomachs, is to invigorate the body politic, to lessen the indigestion of taxes, and diminish those cares in the lump, which drive the community upon false comforts, and make them think life, at its best, a bad thing, the general good of which it is hardly worth while to consult, at the expense of a present relief. The Dissolution of Parliament will have done more for the eventual dissipation of bad humours, bodily as well as mental, than all the medical treatises written for the last thirty years.

Mr Abernethy, who in spite of his exhortations to others, has been described as having a person evidently influenced by good living, and whose temper undoubtedly seemed as if it had been exasperated by it, had got hold of a fine maxim for the regulation of health; but unfortunately he thought it either politic, or witty, or wise, or an allowable indulgence of his spleen, to get angry with the people who came to consult him. He resented their follies, as if they had been bound to be wiser than he. Now if they had been wiser, they would not have needed him; and as they were not, he made a foolish mistake, in supposing that his brusquerie could have an effect upon them beyond the moment, or induce them to abide by his doctrines through the thick of all their temptations to desert them, purely because one morning he had given them a disagreeable "set down." He should have recollected the old story of the sun and the wind. If any medical adviser can obtain a lasting influence upon his patients, it is only by evincing the bland wisdom of those that have made his profession illustrious; by shewing them that he can excuse their weaknesses as well as his own; and by making urbanity, advice, and all cheerful helps to a cure, go together. It appears to us, that if we were a physician, and had address and skill enough to do it, we would endeavour to render ourselves so acceptable to the patient, (not at the expense of any truth, for that never does good, but by so putting the truth as to make it do no harm), that they would be willing to oblige us as a friend: we would then request them to pursue such and such a system (the easiest possible) for a few days, out of consideration to both parties; and during those days we would make it a sine-qua-non, that they should take every pleasure within the range of their means and compatible with their case. If anything could help us on to another few days, this probably would do it; these might produce more; and thus by consulting a mutual humanity, and bringing as many circumstances to bear upon the case as possible, our friend might stand a chance, (for at the best it can be no better), of laying the foundation of that most difficult of all things to superinduce, —a new habit. At any rate, this would be better than the short-sighted roughness of the snubbing and frightening system, which generally supposes quite as much the vanity in the inflictor, as folly in the patient, and that vanity one of the most repulsive sort.

Undoubtedly it must be provoking enough, especially to a man of irritable temper, to have a parcel of weak people coming before him, detailing their nauseous symptoms, and more nauseous management;—to have this man telling you that he "can't do" without eating like a hog, and another enumerating the loathsome means he takes to counteract it; but as we said before, if these people had been wiser, they need not have sought Mr Abernethy; and when they saw before them an irritable man, not without a certain personal burliness of his own, and other symptoms of a vitiated biliary secretion, they might if they pleased, have given him advice for advice, and said, "Physician, heal thyself." It so happened, (and oftener, no doubt, than transpired), that much cleverer men than Mr Abernethy, who had suffered under did him the honour to go and consult him. The late Mr Hazlitt did, for one. Mr Hazlitt's first approaches to anybody had an appearance of excessive timidity and diffidence. The unlucky medical man presumed upon this, and having given his lecture with more than the usual quantum of scorn and superiority, received such a burst of admonition and dissection in return, as can only be conceived by those, who knew how well Mr Hazlitt could utter his indignation, and how terribly anatomize a man's character on the spot. We have seen a paper drawn up by another gentleman, who paid a visit to Mr Abernethy, recording his opinion of him with contemptuous eloquence.

> "—Poor humanity's afflicted will > Struggling in vain with ruthless t'other slice,"

What rendered the manners of this otherwise able man the more offensive, was, that after all, he had got hold of nothing new in his maxims. There was nothing in them to give him a right to lord it over other people as a parcel of fools; and if there had been, he would have been the last to do it. Such was not the style of those illustrious and amiable men, from Hippocrates down to Garth and our own times, who came away from sick rooms and the sight of human suffering with a wisdom perfected by tenderness, and who justly endeared the profession in the eyes of the poets and philosophers, of whose graces they partook. Mr Abernethy's system was as old and as well known as the word Temperance; though it is unfortunately too true, that it did not the less need inculcation. The doctrine, and the contempt of it, and the beauty of following it, have been finely summed up by Milton in the eleventh book of the 'Paradise Lost.'—The Angel Michael says to Adam,

> "Many shapes
> Of Death, and many are the ways that lead
> To his grim cave, all dismal; yet to sense
> More terrible at the entrance, than within.
> Some, as thou saw'st, by violent stroke shall die;
> By fire, flood, famine; by intemperance more
> In meats and drinks, which on the earth shall bring > Diseases dire, of which a monstrous crew
> Before thee shall appear."

Then comes the tremendous picture of the Lazar House, in the course of a melancholy dialogue on which Adam says to the Angel—

> "But is there yet no other way, besides
> These painful passages, how we may come
> To death, and mix with our connatural dust?
> There is, said Michael, if thou well observe
> The rule of Not too much; by temperance taught
> In what thou eat'st and drink'st; seeking from thence > Due nourishment, not gluttonous delight;
> Till many years over thy head return:
> So may'st thou live; till like ripe fruit, thou drop > Into thy mother's lap; or be with ease
> Gather'd, not harshly pluck'd; for death mature."

The golden rule of Not too much, it seems easy enough to observe, while we read it on paper; but the spasms, the dropsies, the asthmas, and joint-racking rheums, the melancholies and the madnesses, of which Milton speaks as the consequence of its violation, and the fact which he mentions of its having killed more human beings than war, flood, fire, or famine, shew what a hard thing it has been for the world to practise this "true and easy method." We see no reason to believe, that as the world improves in other matters, it may not improve in this; and we believe it will: but meanwhile, a physician, to do justice to his profession and his patients, should at least understand the first business of a philosopher with regard to his treatment of other people, and begin his task with a modest consideration for their weaknesses. Many a person feels himself tied and bound in the chain of intemperance, who would willingly get rid of it. Some want the courage to endure the sensations brought on by the first steps of reformation. Others have cares that tempt them to the excess: the melancholy feelings resulting from the short pleasure produced by it, tempt them to its renewal; and thus, with greater or less excuses, people fall into a round of error, of which they are often as sensible as anybody, and a harsh treatment of which may produce in them nothing but a return of the contempt. The only inexcusable patients are those, who allowing themselves every indulgence and every impatient remedy within their reach, are quick to impute error to others, or to be violent with what errors they see; and even they have the excuse of folly. In short, petimus damusque vicissim: we must give and take: we must allow others their excuses, if we would have our own; and as it is on this ground of kindness that we can alone hope to effect any good, or ought to effect it, so we are aware of no good, that may not be hoped for in beginning upon such a principle. The doctor, if he is wise, will begin not only with telling his dyspeptic patient the causes of his complaint, but with insinuating the excuses he may have had for giving way to them, and how far he may have known them from his own experience. The patient will then be tempted to say to himself, "Here is a man of sense, without pride, without narrowness, who has no wish to thrust himself and his superiority down my throat; who has felt as I do; who begins to make me think that what I considered impossible, is feasible; and who absolutely gives me an additional reason for trying it, in the pleasure of agreeing with him."

We have seen, in several instances, the good effects resulting from treatment of this kind; but we never yet knew any good come, or any good that ought to come, out of ignorant assumptions and violent attempts at enforcement; for if it had, evil would have assumed the right of dictating to good itself.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

CALVUS.

Bald mortal! thou dost ape the skeleton
That satirises man and all his doings,
From every open'd grave; and shouldst seem one,
But for the glow-worm which is in thine eyes,
And certain airs that from thy lips arise:
Why, now to see thee at thine amorous coongs,
Or gravely preaching immortality,
To which thy living death's-head gives the lie,
Would make the shadow that all life receiveth
Shake his dim sides with horrible derision:
Tell us, old Calvus! what about thee cleaveth,
To make distinction still between the vision
Of a death's-head and thine? Get thee false hair,
For thy sole privilege to upper air. W.

ANSWER TO THE ABOVE.

I've got my wig:—and now thou rash Hirsutus,
Crinitus, Whiskerandos, Ogre, Bear,
Or whatsoever title please thine hair,
Why vex the bald? Why loveless thus repute us?
Sweet Shakspeare, omni nectare imbutus,
Was bald; and he, the wise beyond compare,
Socrates, teacher of the young and fair;
And Cæsar, victim of a natural Brutus!
Fresh is the bald man's head; for love so apt,
That England's gallants, in her wittiest time,
In voluntary baldness, velvet-capp'd,
Through reams of letters urg'd their amorous rhyme:
Then issued forth, peruk'd; and o'er their shoulders
From ev'ry curl shook loves at all the fair beholders.

EXTRACTS FROM NEW BOOKS.

A SLIGHT SKETCH OF THE ROMANTIC HISTORY OF ASLAN-GHERAI.

In the delightful regions of Circassia, till lately peopled by different tribes, who were all ruled by their respective chiefs, Mouradin Bey had by his personal bravery and by his extortions, acquired a power which made him the dread of his own vassals, and the terror of his neighbours. But in spite of the hatred he inspired, he was caressed and courted by most of the surrounding chiefs. He was possessed of immense wealth, and of a daughter who was an only child, and whose virtues, accomplishments, and expectations, made her an object in every respect worthy of the homage which many a powerful suitor was anxious to pay her. Mouradin was proud of his daughter's accomplishments, and loved to make an ostentatious display of them in festivals, to which he invited the princes and warriors who claimed the honour of aspiring to the hand of the fair Alkazia. As the women in Circassia are in far less restraint than in other parts of the East, and show themselves unveiled at the places of public worship and amusement, Alkazia was frequently allowed to preside at the public games in her father's palace, where strength and address were displayed in darting the javelin, managing the lance, drawing the bow, foot-racing, and equestrian exercises of various kinds. Among those who most distinguished themselves by their expertness on similar occasions, and who more eagerly sought to make themselves worthy of Alkazia's notice, was the young Aslan-Gherai. He was a descendant of the sovereigns of the Crimea, and though hardly yet in his twentieth year, had gained considerable repute for his personal bravery, and his entire fitness in the Circassian art of war. Alkazia had frequently awarded to him the prize at these gymnastic exercises, and her heart became at last the recompense that she was most anxious to bestow on the valorous youth. Their eyes soon revealed their sentiments to each other, and Aslan-Gherai, though poor and powerless, resolved to solicit the bey's permission to their union. Accordingly, he presented himself before Mouradin, at a moment when the bey was discussing the plan of an expedition which promised an abundant booty. Not doubting but Aslan had come to offer his services, he told him at once that he should consider success infallible when having the assistance of so distinguished a warrior. "I come," said Aslan, "first to solicit the hand of her whom I love, and on whose affections I rely. Though bereft of my domains, I am still the rightful descendant of a sovereign house, and I trust to my sword for the future achievement of honours which shall make up for what the fate of arms has deprived other members of my family. It is your daughter's hand I ask." "My daughter's hand!" exclaimed Mouradin; "my surprise is equal to my wrath! Knowest thou not that the most powerful princes of Circassia would give half of their treasures to obtain only the hope of such an alliance?—and thou, whose only patrimony is his arms and his horse, an outcast on the wide world, darest to ask the preference of the most powerful of the land!—Go, my poor boy; I pardon thy audacity because I esteem thy virtues; but if I learn that my daughter shall, after my will has been made known to her, give you the smallest encouragement to think of her, depend upon it I bestow her upon the very man who brings me the information!"

His hopes thus blasted, and seeing nothing but humiliation and misery reserved for him in that land, Aslan-Gherai resolved to leave it; but, if possible, to induce Alkazia to accompany him. The fair Circassian could not bear the thoughts of being deserted by her lover; and well aware of the inflexibility of her father's resolves, she yielded to Aslan's entreaties. Both mounted on the same steed, and favoured by the darkness of the night, they made the best of their way towards the Kuban, the western banks of which were occupied by Russian troops. Their flight, however, had been soon discovered, and hardly had they, by day-break, reached the borders of that river, when a party of some riders in pursuit, overtook them. To surrender quietly was a thought which could not enter the daring mind of Aslan-Gherai. He therefore got off his horse, concealed Alkazia in a thicket, mounted again, and rushed upon the pursuers with so much impetuosity, that after cutting down several of them, the others turned about, and proceeded to join the more numerous body of the guards who had been despatched as a reserve in the pursuit. Nothing was now left but to dash into the deep and rapid waters of the Kuban. Aslan fastened Alkazia on his horse, and then taking the bridle in his hand, they plunged resolutely into the stream, and fortunately succeeded in reaching safely the opposite banks. On this side of the river, guarded by the Cossacks of the Black Sea, they were in safety. Some of these had witnessed the bravery displayed by Aslan, and were willing to afford every assistance in their power in protecting him and his charge against any further danger. He desired them to conduct him to their General. They brought him before the Duke de Richelieu, who commanded in chief the Russian forces employed against the Circassians. Aslan stated his case to the Duke, claimed his protection, and requested to be allowed to enter the Russian service, that he might be enabled to avenge his wrongs. His request was acceded to, and from that moment Aslan-Gherai became one of the Circassians' most formidable foes. Abundance of opportunities offered themselves during the campaign, wherein his services were highly useful. He led the Russians through the intricate passes of the Caucasus, and greatly distinguished himself at the storming of Anappa. At the close of that campaign the Emperor, at the recommendation of the Duke de Richelieu, rewarded his bravery by conferring on him the cross of St George and a medallion of honour. In the campaign of 1810, against the Circassians, Aslan-Gherai displayed so much intrepidity and valour, that he carried terror among the enemy, who fled at the mere cry that Aslan-Gherai was coming. He was chiefly instrumental in the taking of a fortress of Sougiouk-Kallay, on which occasion, besides being promoted to the rank of a general, he received from the Emperor the gift of a sword, the hilt of which was mounted in brilliants, and bore this inscription—"Reward for Valour."

The Circassian tribes most obnoxious to the Russians having been subdued, Aslan-Gherai retired to the spot he had selected for his Alkasia's residence during his absence in the field, to enjoy some repose. This, however, was not very long allowed him. In the autumn of 1811 the Chapricks, one of the most remote but most turbulent tribes of Circassia, having again broken out into open hostility against Russia, troops were sent against them, and Aslan-Gherai was desired to take a command in the expedition. He did so, and on one occasion having, according to his usual practice, suffered himself to be carried away by his impetuosity, he rushed alone into the ranks of the enemy, where he received several mortal wounds. His detachment followed close at his heels, and forcing the Circassians to give way, picked up Aslan, who was not yet quite dead. He desired those who carried him off the field of battle to take him to the tent of General Roudzievitz, the commander-in-chief, to whose care he fervently recommended his wife Alkasia, and in whose presence he soon after breathed his last, being then only in the twenty-fourth year of his age. Poor Alkasia's grief was unspeakable: she has never recovered from it, nor does she wish it ever to change. She lives retired at Sevastopol, in the Crimea. In the garden of her house the remains of her husband are deposited, and she waits with impatience for the time when she may be taken to lie by them for ever.—Journal of a Nobleman.

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

Chinese Windows.—The Chinese use oyster-shells made very thin as a substitute for glass in the windows of their houses, and of some of their imperial barks.—Notes to Hau Kiou Choaan.

The Poles.—The Athenæum (a paper with which we have but lately had the pleasure of becoming acquainted, and which is by far the best journal of the kind) says, in presenting its readers with an interesting original article on "Russia and Poland," that "the success of the Poles has astonished all our politicians." We know not whether we may come under the head of the class of persons here mentioned, though we have fought hard in our time for the good cause; but we are somewhat proud of having said, from the first, that the Poles would succeed; and, accordingly, cannot help putting in our plea thereupon.

Sir Walter Scott.—It is with regret amounting almost to personal sorrow, that we announce the probability of the approaching departure of one of the greatest and most amiable men of the age—a man whom we know but by his fame, which has come unto all, and by his works, which have for many years lightened and cheered the hours of languor and of leisure, wherever genius was esteemed or its labours relished. Sir Walter Scott, our Edinburgh letters inform us, lies on a bed of mortal sickness. The excellent baronet had a shock of apoplexy on the night of the 19th. Mr Cadell, Sir Walter's publisher, and Dr Abercromby, had left Edinburgh in haste for Abbotsford. It is said that Sir Walter had a presentiment of the coming stroke; and that he was led to anticipate it, not more from what he himself felt, than from the fact that his father and others of his family had suffered from the same disease. —Spectator. It gives us great pleasure to state, that the account of Sir W. Scott's health in the above paragraph is partially incorrect. It is true that the distinguished man, who has given so much delight to the world by the creations of his genius, has been lately suffering from illness, but we have been assured that his malady is not of a nature to create alarm among his friends. Dr Abercromby has been to Abbotsford, but has written tranquillizing accounts of Sir Walter to his friends.—Times. It is hoped that the Tatler need not add, how heartily it sympathizes with the pleasure expressed at this better news of the great novelist, who is destined to delight countless ages.

Etienne Henri Mehul.—When Mehul the composer was sixteen years of age, he visited Paris, and was taken by a friend to the rehearsal of Gluck's Iphigenie en Tauride. He had no money, and being very desirous to witness the performance, which was to take place on the following day, he determined to conceal himself in the boxes till then. He was discovered, and turned out; but the attempt came to the ears of Gluck, who gave him a ticket of admission, invited him to his house, and became his friend. He devoted himself earnestly to dramatic composition, and having undertaken to compose an opera, in which he found his progress continually interrupted by calls, invitations, and engagements of various kinds, he actually entreated the Superintendent of the Police to confine him in the Bastile till he had finished it. The indulgence, however, was denied him. Mehul was the intimate friend of Cherubini, and lost the place of Maitre de Chapelle to Napoleon, which was offered to him on the death of Paisello, by begging permission to share it with him.—From the Harmonicon.

An Ordinance respecting Aix-la-Chapelle.—The city having from time immemorial derived great benefit from a gambling-house, we, in our parental goodness, permit it to be opened from May to August, the months that foreigners generally resort to the city, for the benefit of the waters; but this indulgence is not to have any bad effect on the morals of the citizens, and the police are to turn out everybody whom they suspect not to be able to afford to lose money.—Frederick.

Violent Deaths of Illustrious Writers of Antiquity.—By a strange fatality, a great proportion of the illustrious writers of antiquity were prematurely cut off from existence. Euripides and Heraclitus were torn to pieces by dogs. Theocritus ended his career by the halter. Empedocles was lost in the crater of Mount Ætna. Hesiod was murdered by his secret enemies. Archilocus and Ibycus, by banditti. Sappho threw himself from a precipice. Æschylus perished by the fall of a tortoise from the claws of an eagle. Anacreon (as might have been expected) owed his death to the juice of the vine. Cratinus and Terence experienced the same fate with Menander, who was drowned. Seneca and Lucan were condemned to death by a tyrant, cut their veins, and died repeating their own verses; and Petronius Arbiter met a similar catastrophe. Lucretius, it is said, wrote under the dominion of a philtre administered by his mistress, and destroyed himself from its effects. Poison, though swallowed under very different circumstances, cut short both the days of Socrates and Demosthenes; and Cicero fell under the proscription of the triumvirates. It is truly wonderful that so many men, the professed votaries of peace and retirement, should have met with fates so widely different from that to which the common casualties of life should seem to expose them.—Philemon died of laughter. Entering a room to eat figs, he found an ass leisurely devouring them one by one; to complete the repast, he ordered a slave to present a goblet of wine to his long-eared guest. The ridiculous effect provoked so violent a fit of laughter, that he was suffocated in the struggle.—Blund's Greek Anthology.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

Drury-Lane.—William Tell—Perfection—And the Ice Witch.

Covent Garden.—The Maid of Honour—The Omnibus—And Neuha's Cave.

Queen's Theatre.

We are at a loss what to say to the new "Comedietta" in three acts, with "melodies by the author," which was produced here last night, called The Times. We admire the goodnature of modern audiences; it was never more admirably evinced than last night; and the more admirable, the more our admiration is bound to increase, and our criticism to be modest in proportion. Surely no author was ever luckier. Here was a production, the greatest part of which could only have been heard with patience; the plot was meagre and forced; the pleasantries consisted chiefly of poor puns; it seldom excited a laugh: we wondered how the three acts could go on without a storm, and yet we heard not a syllable of disapprobation except from one sulky person who sat by us quarrelling with a friend, and with whom one felt tempted to disagree. Moreover, whenever the audience could seize anything to laugh with, they pounced upon it with a sort of fervour of good will; and at the fall of the curtain, the applause was nemine contradicente. How to account for all this, we cannot tell; unless the author was known to the major part of his visitors, and is himself one of the best-natured of men: in which case we are sorry to record this difference of opinion with them, and can very sincerely tell him that we value such a nature "above all the trophies of wit."

The plot turns upon a paragraph in The Times, advertising for a lost two hundred pounds; but we fairly own, we are unable to detail it. There is another passage about a pig. The scenes chiefly pass in the lodging-house of Mrs Cosy (Mrs Glover) whose object it is to make her visitors comfortable, and to cheat them. A Mr Wasp (Mr J. Russell) who has a hump (which is meant, we suppose, as a philosophical excuse for his waspishness, but which certainly does not imply any such defect of temper, men with that deformity being often very amiable) goes about among Mrs Cosy's lodgers and the villagers, making all the mischief he can, out of pure disinclination to be idle; and thus Mrs Cosy is involved with her lover Mr Muz, a retired watchmaker and invalid (Mr Marshall); Captain Lance (Mr Green) with his mistress Miss Nightingale (Mrs Humby); and Humphrey Honeysuckle (Mr Barnett) with his mistress Rachel (Miss Wells) and a barber's heir (Mr WILKINSON). Most of these parties get into quarantine, on account of a report that there is the plague in London, and a supposition that the box containing the lost bank-bill is infected. The box has passed from this person to that, sometimes unfairly; and thus the criminals are to be frightened. The last scene takes place in the prison; and Rachel, who first found the bill, finds it again in the hands of her lover, to whom it has come round, and with whom a quarrel caused by a mistake respecting the watchmaker is made up. But all these affairs hung so ill together, that we cannot be sure we recollect even their main features properly. The best thing in the piece is an interview between Rachel and Humphrey Honeysuckle, where the former begs his pardon before she sets out upon an intended journey to London. We thought there was a touch in it of the real pastoral taste (theatrically speaking) of the BICKERSTAFFS and O'KEEFES; and with this saving grace for the author we are glad to conclude.

The actors did their best. The music (what there is of it) is in good taste, but meagre.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We shall insert AGIS with pleasure.

The Shabby Paper, we understand, has again been at us. We shall see whether its remarks are worth notice, and what sort of notice; and act accordingly.

We have to apologize to the author of "Odds and Ends of the French Drama" for not answering his letter sooner, especially as we do not contemplate at present any such arrangement as he speaks of. We beg him to accept our apology and our thanks. His communication will be left for him, in the course of to-morrow, at the Publisher's.

DRAMATICUS is right in complaining of our not speaking of the Performers when we noticed the Pledge; but the fact is, the last act had so absorbed us with its strange but affecting catastrophe, that we literally forgot to mention them.

LIVES OF NAPOLEON.

TO THE TATLER.

" Je lui peux immoler mon repos et ma vie;
Tout, hors le vérité, que je préfère à lui."

Sir,—It would be fortunate for the readers of history, if the authors whom they peruse, had adopted this excellent motto of the hero of Voltaire. It is to the discredit of human nature, and to the irreparable misfortune of moral literature, that it has been so frequently violated. Men consider it innocent to mould the character of an individual to preconceived impression, or to what it ought to be, to serve the purposes of a party.

Why has not the world condemned this flagrant dereliction from duty at another bar than that of public opinion? Of course I do not intend to condemn diversity of opinion, but diversity, suppression, and alteration of facts. I have been led to make these remarks, in considering the difficulty which, from this source, exists in forming an estimate of the character of Napoleon Bonaparte. Are we disciples of the enemies of freedom, the question is soon answered: he was an advocate of that sacred cause, he is their inveterate and eternal foe. The difficulty rests with the friend of liberty: its followers are far more tender respecting means than their adversaries; there are with them so many ways to the same end, that the ultimate object is neglected, and their strength, instead of being united and exerted against the common enemy, spent in quarrels and disputes with one another. Thus we shall find two writers of brilliant genius, both ardent lovers of liberty, both uniting in detestation of despotism, holding opinions diametrically opposite on the character of Napoleon Bonaparte; and not only are their opinions different, but the facts on which they are formed are different also: the Bonaparte of Hazlitt is essentially another than the Bonaparte of Dr Channing;—he has different motives—he performs other actions. Without alluding to the tergiversation of facts, so visible on a cursory glance over this subject, it may be interesting to enquire why these two eminent men should be predisposed to look with different eyes on the Dieu mortel of Frenchmen.

There appears to have been in Hazlitt a love of the concrete, as the metaphysician expresses it. He could not worship idealities. Despotism and slavery were forcibly and palpably enough dressed out before him, and a hatred of them was rooted, for ever, in his breast; but of Liberty, except in Bonaparte, he had no personification. Who can imagine the thirsting of a mind like his, for the gratification which the first victories of Bonaparte gave to the friends of liberty? Here was sympathy with the intensity of his hatred. Here were the springs of hope, adoration, and affection, after exhausting struggles of detestation and despair. Other men can view topics with indifference, as to approval or disapproval, but Hazlitt combined affection with admiration, and dislike, if not hatred, with disapprobation; with the magnitude of the topic, was the magnitude of his affection. Liberty is a vast and overwhelming subject; within its sphere the strongest intellect can wander unconfined,—it became the temple in which he worshipped,—the " Religion of his heart" was its dictates. Bonaparte was a vast and amazing being: he must be either loved or hated; he was loved—he became a " God." He was the founder of a new dispensation,—a redemption of mankind, which it was Hazlitt's holiest and dearest employ to preach and promulgate, —a religion of which he was " found worthy " to be an apostle,— to which he became a martyr. Yes, how indeed he was ready to offer up his repose and his life on the altar of devotion, his readers will always remember. Would that the last line of our motto were as applicable to him as the first. Nor must we conceal from ourselves, that the personal enmities of Hazlitt had a great share in heightening his attachment to Bonaparte: every act of whose brilliant career was doubly welcome, as furthering the cause he had principally at heart, abroad, and striking terror into the breasts of his enemies, at home. And no man endowed with half his depth of passion and sensibility could bear to have the veil torn from before his eyes,—could hear liberty (for this cause was identified with Liberty) mocked, and its sacred name derided by " perjured men in its courts," without feeling tenfold intensity of affection for it in misfortune. He could not bare his bosom of all that he had felt, and lived, and hoped for; and return, bleak, desolate, and doubly heart-rent by disappointment to the cold and chilling views of his youth. The wreck of the cause in which his soul had been embarked, was sufficient " dowry of misfortune," without that which its desertion would have entailed. Whoever has read his apologies for some of the most equivocal transactions of Bonaparte's life will recognise the truth of these remarks. His defence of the execution of the Duc D'Enghien,—his reasoning on the assumption of the Imperial dignity, and on the general offensive tactics of Bonaparte, may be particularly noted. Indeed, where he censures his hero, as for want of sympathy with the general principles of liberty, in the case of the patriot Poles and of the Russian serfs, his manner is somewhat forced, and conveys an idea that this censure is not given willingly, but as being required on the desirable ground of impartiality. In the same manner he praises the eloquence and genius of Burke, and the consistent bearing of Castlereagh. There is one stain, however, on the character of Bonaparte, unequivocal, undefended, and, I fear, indefensible. Who that has read of the war for independence in Hayti?—who that has sympathised with the heroic patriotism, the moderation, the glorious valour, and splendid abilities of its ill-fated chief?—who that has dropt a tear to the pure and unsullied memory of Toussaint, and breathed revenge against that deserter from his cause, who, whilst emancipating himself, rewarded the freedom of another with chains?—who that has felt these " thoughts that burn," before apologies for military despotism could find room in his mind, has not known that the dungeon of Toussaint rises up in judgment, for ever, with him, against admiration of the entombed of St Helena?—To return from this digression: Two words will afford us sufficient reason for supposing that the Bonaparte of Hazlitt would not be the Bonaparte of Channing. The latter is a Christian Minister. His scale of judgment is higher and more prescribed. With him the end does not justify the means. Besides the absence of the peculiar organization of Hazlitt, he has nothing to call forth the ebullitions of passion and spleen. His life is not one of active engagement; he is but a spectator in the struggle for liberty. He can have no conception of the calumnies, disappointments, and continued attacks, which its advocates here undergo. He is an American, and the assumption of Superiority is as much an eye-sore to him as the Divine Right to Hazlitt. Bonaparte reiterated the principle, and Channing preferred the tacit recognition of " Alexander the Deliverer." His conception of liberty is of a perfect, refined, immaterial, unimpassioned existence; of a temple " pure and undefiled," and he startles at the idea of investing, as High Priest, a rude and blood-stained warrior. There is an etherial stillness and unchanging calmness about Channing, which would be shocked by the clamour, however unobjectionable, of a material struggle. His Essay on the character of Fenelon will convey an excellent idea of the unearthliness of his conceptions. With him, too, there is nothing to be removed; the prejudices, associations, and institutions of the old world he beholds already demolished. However vast may be his anticipations,—however gigantic his belief in the capabilities of human nature,—however grand his speculations,—he has nothing to remove in realizing them. For this reason his ideas respecting liberty were more positive than ours,—they are not necessarily associated with those of contest and demolition. Offensive war, executions, arbitrary titles, unexampled sufferings, are not with him means to liberty, equality, peace, and happiness. Channing does not appear to mingle his ideas of liberty with anything of the present character or habits of man. In the silence of contemplation,—in the moment of mental excitement,— in the depths of thought, visions bright and beautiful float before him, decked by the splendour of his imagination, and bearing, from their celestial calmness, the impress of his peculiar mind. How different a picture he presents to Hazlitt, whose dream of liberty is agitated by a thousand passions—by feverish recollections of desertion and heartlessness—oppressed by the nightmare, misanthropy,—and sometimes lost amidst clouds of despair. Channing has probably, too, personal feeling at stake, but it is of a different description. The Americans anticipated an invasion from Bonaparte, and their personal apprehensions were, doubtless, sufficient to turn the scale of their judgments against him. It may be conceived, also, that with Channing's refined and poetical views respecting the latent energies and immeasurable extent of Christianity, he would be disposed to look with scorn upon one whose mind was not capacious enough to view it in any other light than that of a political footstool: hence his allowing but the minimum of greatness to Bonaparte,—greatness of action.

There are anomalies in American Politics, rendering it difficult for an Englishman to account satisfactorily for the extreme views of this splendid writer. There appears to be some analogy between the affection which he manifests for "Alexander the Deliverer," and the support which a Minister of the House of Hanover affords to the ex-King of France. Captain Hall has observed, that no two countries in Europe are so much opposed in actual condition as England to the United States; this statement is probably not altogether untrue. The public mind in England is far more enlightened than the Institutions.—The Institutions of America are adapted to a far more enlightened state of society than its population affords. An historical fact will account for the latter inaptitude, three months sufficed to convert the Americans from subjects of a monarchy to citizens of a republic. Of how long, Mr Tatler, will this in England be the work?

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

BREVITY IS THE SOUL OF WIT.—Haynes, Hinds, and Co. of Sandy Hill, in a notice of dissolution, inform "all persons who were not pleased to pay down, on the purchase of goods, will please to pay up without delay. Mark that."—American Paper.

— A lawyer in the district of Colombia having wearied the Court by a very long and dull argument, his colleague respectfully suggested to him the expediency of bringing it to a close. The lawyer angrily replied, "I will speak as long as I please, Sir!"—"You have spoken longer than you please, already," retorted his companion.—Massachusetts Journal.

THE POET-HONORING INN-KEEPER.—Cowper having occasion to send his servant Samuel to the George Inn, at Woburn, the landlord, Mr Martin, hearing whose servant he was, told him that he had never seen Mr Cowper, but he had heard him frequently spoken of by the companies that had called at his house, and therefore when Sam would have paid for his breakfast, would take nothing from him. "Who says that fame is only empty breath?" says the poet,—"on the contrary, it is good ale and cold beef into the bargain."—Hayley's Life of Cowper.

CHINESE WRITING MATERIALS.—The Chinese in writing use no pens, but pencils made of the hair of some animal, commonly a rabbit. This pencil they hold not obliquely as painters use, but perpendicularly, as if they would prick the paper. The reader, perhaps, needs not to be informed that they write not from the left hand to the right as we do, nor from the right to the left like the Hebrews, but in lines from the top of the leaf to the bottom, beginning at the right hand. The Chinese paper is not made of silk, as is commonly supposed, but of the inner bark of trees; and is remarkable not only that they can make it into sheets of extraordinary size, but also that after it hath been written on, and worn to pieces, they can work it over again, and from the scraps make new paper. The Chinese paper hath a beautiful gloss, but it is thin, brittle, and not at all durable. Their ink, which is known in Europe by the name of Indian ink, is made of lamp-black, of which the best is got by burning old pines. They mix perfumes with it to correct the smell. These ingredients are worked into the consistence of paste, which is then put into wooden moulds of the shape they would have it. The Chinese standish is a little polished marble with a hollow at one end to contain water; in this they dip their stick of ink, and then rub it on the smooth part of the marble. The pencil, paper, ink, and marble, are called by the Chinese the four precious things, which they pique themselves on keeping very neat. Everything which relates to letters is so reputable in China, that even the making of ink is not esteemed a mechanic employment.—Notes to Hau Kiou Choaan.

EPIGRAM.

To call a Lord a "thing," is voted treason:
To call him "no-thing," then, must be in reason.

Times.

— In an article on the origin of words, published in 'Le Courier Des Etats-Unis,' there is a curious account of the derivation of the word bigot. It appears that Rolla, a Norman Duke, being asked to kiss the feet of his Sovereign, Charles the Simple, answered, "No, I will not, by got." When the same people were asked whether they would be baptized, they replied, "We will, by got." This phrase being so common among them, foreigners called the Normans "by gots;" as the French now call the English Messeiurs God-damn; and the Spanish "Si Signors." By degrees, the word by got became bigot, and was applied to those who always had the name of God in their mouths.

THE LEAP OF A WHALE.—As we were lying on our oars, and somewhat puzzled what to do next, we beheld one of the most extraordinary sights in the world, at least I do not remember to have seen many things which have surprised me so much, or made a deeper impression on my memory. Our friend the whale, probably finding the water disagreeably shallow, for, as I have said, it was not more than fifty or sixty feet deep—or, perhaps, provoked at not being able to disentangle himself from the sharp coral reefs, or for some other reason of pleasure or of pain—suddenly made a spring out of the water. So complete was this enormous leap, that for an instant we saw him fairly up in the air, in a horizontal position, at a distance from the water not much short, I should think, of half his own breadth! His back, therefore, must have been at least twenty feet, in perpendicular height, over our heads! While in this progress upwards, there was in his spring some touch of the vivacity with which a trout or salmon shoots out of the water; but he fell back again on the sea, like a huge log thrown on its broadside, and with such a thundering crash as made all hands stare in astonishment, and "the boldest held his breath for a time." Total demolition, indeed, must have been the inevitable fate of our party, had the whale taken his leap one minute sooner, for he would then have fallen plump on the boats. The waves caused by the explosion spread over half the anchorage; nor, if the Leander herself had blown up, could the effect have extended much further. As we rolled about in the cutter from side to side, we had time to balance the expediency of further proceedings against the tolerable chance of being smashed to atoms under the whale's belly at his next leap.—Hall's Fragments of Voyages and Travels.

PORCELAIN WORKS IN CHINA.—Every trade in China hath its tutelar deity, and that of the potter owes its origin to the following accident. The Emperor sent down models which, after vain attempts, the workmeu humbly represented it was not possible to execute. They were answered by blows and still more pressing instances. At last, one of the workmen, in despair, three himself into the burning oven, and was consumed in an instant. The chinaware then baking, it is said, proved perfectly fine, and entirely to the Emperor's liking. The desperado became a hero, and was thenceforth worshipped as the divinity presiding over the porcelain works,—by the name of Pu-sa. Although the Chinese workmen cannot execute all the models which are brought them, yet they complete many surprising works. * * * * P. Dentrecolles assures us, that he hath seen a large lanthorn like that of a ship, all of china, through which one candle enlightened a whole room. He tells us also that they make flutes, flageolets, and other musical instruments, of porcelain; as likewise ducks and tortoises, to float on the water; and that he hath seen a cat so painted to the life, with a lamp placed in the head as to represent the eyes, that rats were frightened at it. The same writer informs us, that they have mades urns which coss more than eighty crowns a piece at the furnace.—Notes to Han Kiou Choaan.—[It is strange that the Emperor did not order a man to be sacrificed at every baking, since the the poor workman's death proved so beneficial.]

BABOO RAMMOHUN ROY.—This distinguished individual, the first Bramin who has ever been in England, arrived in the metropolis on the 16th instant. He is accompanied by his son, Baja Baba, and servants. The Baboo is, as we understand, possessed of high intellectual powers, and by a course of self-education has become learned, not only in Persian, Arabic, Sanscrit, and several of the vernacular languages of India, but has acquired an extensive knowledge of the English language and literature. He devoted his early attention to the sacred writings of the Hindoos, and soon found that they had been much corrupted, and that numerous superstitions had arisen out of those corruptions, some of which were of a cruel and demoralizing character. Among the rest he proved, both to his own countrymen and to the English, that the practice of concremation, or burning of widows with their husbands' corpses, was not enjoined by the Shasters. At length he extended the field of his inquiries to Judaism, and ultimately to Christianity. He abandoned the superstitions of Hindooism, and became even a polemical writer on the Christian religion. He has not, it is said, cordially embraced the doctrines of Christianity, nor does he think it necessary to dwell upon them; alleging that it will be time enough to examine them more particularly when Christians themselves are agreed as to their import. The morality of the system he greatly admires, and thinks it worthy of universal extension. Among several ingenious works which he has written in English, one of the most popular, is entitled "The Precepts of Jesus." His religious opinions approach the nearest to Unitarianism. His manners, it is said, are very engaging; and these, together with his recondite information respecting India, his learning, and his high mental powers, make his company to be eagerly sought after.—The Christian Advocate.

ARTIFICIAL PEARLS.—Lake Williams, in his history of Inventions and Discoveries, says the Chinese obtain false pearls from a kind of muscle, in the following manner: 'In the beginning of summer, at the time when the muscles rise to the surface of water and occasionally open their shells, they watch the moment and place in each shell five or six small beads strung upon a thread. At the end of the year, when they fish for these, they draw them up; and upon opening them, they discover the head encrusted with a pearly substance, and having a perfect resemblance to real pearls. It is said there is now in the possession of the British Royal Society, large chamæ brought from China, which are a species of muscle, in which there are several bits of iron wire encrusted with pearl. Those bits of wire it appears were originally rough, and it is judged probable the animal emitted this substance as a means to procure ease from the irritation it must unavoidably occasion.'

KOTZEBUE'S ENTERTAINMENT IN RADACK.—The author who was, it seems, the discoverer of the Radack Islands, and had become a great favourite with the natives during his first visit, returned, after an interval of eight years, in a vessel so much larger than that which he formerly commanded, that the natives fled in alarm. When they ascertained that their visitor was Totabu (as they pronounced his name) they were in an ecstasy of delight. Having led him to the chief, they entertained him in a style of the most poetic rusticity.—"Upon a verdant spot before it, and surrounded and shaded by bread-fruit trees, young girls were busily spreading mats for Dr Eschscholz and myself to sit on. Rarik and Lagediak seated themselves facing us, and the mother (eighty years of age) by my side, at a little distance. The other islanders formed a compact circle around us; the nearest line seating themselves, and those behind standing, to secure a better view of us. Some climbed the trees; and fathers raised their children in their arms, that they might see over the heads of the people. The women brought baskets of flowers, and decorated us with garlands; and Rarik's mother, drawing from her ears the beautiful white flower, of the lily kind, so carefully cultivated here as an indispensable ornament of the female sex, did her best to fasten it into mine ear with strings of grass, while the people expressed their sympathy by continual cries of "Aidarah!" (Friend). In the mean time, the young girls were employed in pressing into muscle-shells the juice of the pandanas, which they presented to us, with a sort of sweetmeat called mogan, prepared from the same fruit. The flavour of both is very agreeable.—Kotzebue's New Voyage round the World.

Overture, Oberon	C. M. Von Weber.

Leader, Mr LODER,—Conductor, Mr T. COOKE.

THE selection and performance of last Monday evening afforded us an almost unvaried succession of delight. We unconsciously—we might say unavoidably envied the proud satisfaction which must have now and then crossed the mind of the Chevalier NEUKOMM, (who sat at a little remove from us) as he cast his eye over the bill of fare, upon finding that the most tasteful musical audience, and the finest body of performers in Europe were that evening engaged in paying homage exclusively to his own countrymen; and among them the greatest geniuses, of melody and harmony combined, that ever existed. MOZART, HAYDN, BEETHOVEN, HUMMEL, WEBER, and MARSCHNER. HAYDN'S symphony, No. VIII, called the 'Drum Symphony,' was most admirably played. With the exception of the andante, this is not our favourite among the twelve; and yet when we reflect upon the masterly way in which he has treated his subjects, his modulations, the ingenious manner in which he has dispersed the various features of his melodies among the instruments, particularly in that lovely finale, we sympathise with Juliet, who in a hasty moment could be induced to utter a word of detraction from the perfect qualities of her lover:

"Oh! what a beast was I to chide him thus!"

Mr BRAHAM took considerable pains in singing the fine scena of BEETHOVEN'S, "Per Pietà." We thought that in the recitative he was somewhat too laborious and violent. His words are apt to proceed from him with the emphatic sigh of a pavior. In the air, however, he acquitted himself with good taste and feeling.

The Quintett (and a charming one it is) was most beautifully played. MORI at first appeared a little nervous; his lonely tone, however, never deserted him, and his wonted firmness returned with the second movement. He played as finely as ever.

HUMMEL, the pupil of MOZART, the musician for whom, when a little boy, HAYDN wrote a sonata, and which he performed at one of SALOMON'S concerts, led Madame STOCKHAUSEN into the room, and conducted the performance of his own beautiful composition, 'Deh calma.' The reception he met with from the audience was animated, and fully worthy one of the most graceful and most exuberant geniuses now living. It was gratifying, when contemplating the man before us, to think of the little boy who had been patted on the head and encouraged by such a creature as MOZART; and how fair and noble a blossoming had come forth from his fostering care and masterly training. So high an esteem had the tutor for the accomplishment of his little pupil, that he has made him play to him for hours, while he himself lay down, exhausted by mental and bodily exertion.

MARSCHNER'S overture disappointed us. It is noisy, screaming, deficient in subject, and has little or no relief in the treatment. It is inferior in design to his overture to 'Der Vampyr;' and, to sum up all our objections, it is an imitation of WEBER'S most turbulent compositions. The author of the fine, characteristic music in 'Der Vampyr' is capable of better things than a bald repetition of another musician's ideas.

The finale to BEETHOVEN'S symphony is, in our opinion, unequal to the previous movements. The second is perhaps one of the finest he ever composed. It is grave, rich, and lugubrious as a pompous funeral procession. By an indescribable association of ideas, BEETHOVEN, in a movement such as the one alluded to, not unfrequently reminds us of the colouring of REMBRANDT: his musical colouring frequently partakes of the same character; it is darkly gorgeous, solid, consistent with its subject, and deeply mysterious: more always appears to be "meant than meets the ear." He should have composed for the Greek tragedians, and have set to music the fatal chorus of the Parcæ.

Signor SANTINI, like a true singer, imagined that the encore of 'Qui sdegno' was a compliment to his performance, and not to the lovely melody itself; he must therefore, upon the repetition of it, take upon himself to play tricks with the text, and consequently spoil both the character of the original and the intention of the composer. To introduce Rossinian flourishes in a simple air, sung by a High Priest, is of itself ludicrous enough. Flourishing begins to be smoked—above all, the flourishing of Priests. Signor SANTINI did not appear, from his manner, to understand his subject; he was too loud and hard. The quality of his voice is blaring and cow-like: his style too is abrupt and staccatoed. Mr H. PHILLIPS, who is a far better cantabile singer, sang the same air last year at these concerts in much better style and with more appropriate expression.

For tone and execution we never heard any performer on the horn comparable with Signor PUZZI. Although the fantasia he played upon the present occasion received but little applause, the skill of the performer himself, we think, should have received a distinguished encouragement.

Madame STOCKHAUSEN and Mr BRAHAM sang the duet from Il Don Giovanni with correctness of feeling and expression; and the beautiful overture to Oberon, which was loudly applauded, concluded the performance of a judicious selection of sterling music.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

Lectures on Anatomy, Surgery, and Pathology; including Observations on the Nature and Treatment of Local Diseases. By John Abernethy, F.R.S. &c. &c. 12mo, pp. 580. Second edit. Westley.

Having the other day made some observations suggested by the recent death of this eminent surgeon, it may not perhaps be unacceptable to some of our readers, if we take up the volume of his Lectures, delivered at St Bartholomew's, a second edition of which has been recently published, for the purpose of making a few extracts.

We will commence with the Lecturer's account of a painful affection of the nerves called tic douloureux, which appears to be a comparatively new disease; at least he says there was no such thing "dreamt of in his time;" and then follows a sly insinuation that the increase of diseases has kept pace with that of the doctors.

'Tic Douloureux.—It was a rare thing, in the early part of my life, to see many cases of disease produced by increased vascular action, which are now common; and so it is with diseases depending on an undue nervous action in a part; for I do not think there was such a thing as tic douloureux ever dreamt of in my time. How this comes, I don't know. There has been a great increase of medical men, it is true, of late years, but, upon my life, diseases have increased in proportion; that is a great comfort. As to the disease, it is attended with the most intense pain; there is no increased vascular action in the lip or cheek, for they look as usual; there is no increased vascular action generally, nor any error in the absorbent system; but, as to the pain, it is most excruciating; ah! often beyond endurance. I have seen people with this disease perfectly free from pain one instant, and who, whilst talking or doing something else, have been suddenly seized with the most racking and excruciating pain imaginable. I remember one young woman in particular, who, when the paroxysms of pain came on, would tear handfuls of hair from her head, and required three strapping young men to hold her; so tormenting is the pain, so formidable are the effects which it produces! Well, it is a very curious disease; and some persons have been led to divide the nerves of the part, but, I say, you might as well expect to cure a man with gout of the pain in his great toe, by dividing the nerves going to the toe, as to cure person of tic douloureux by the division of a nerve. In both cases the complaint is perfectly constitutional. You may see a person with gout who is almost unable to move with the pain; but produce a shock on the nervous system, by telling him that the house is on fire, and he will scamper about like a lamplighter. As Smollett tells us, in one of his novels, of Captain Lismahago, who went into a house and cried out to an old gentleman with the gout, "Mad dog, mad dog!" when he jumped up, and ran out of the house even into a pond of water opposite.

'In this complaint, one part alone is not affected; the disease flies from one part to another, and the division of the nerves does no good. Can it be cured? Undoubtedly, if you can tranquillize the disorder of the nervous system. But how is this to be done? Why, I don't know, nor do I believe any body else knows. As I say to patients who call upon me with these kinds of affections, if I could quiet irritable nerves, strengthen weak ones, and regulate the distribution of the nervous energy, then I could cure all the diseases you would bring to me. This may be wrong, or let it be otherwise, I know of no other medium through which these affections can be cured, than that of the nervous system; and, I believe, that if the patient be put on a rational plan of diet, and his digestive organs got into a right state, these affections will not come twice, at least if the patient remain in good health. I have seen many cases of this kind, and feel strongly convinced as to the truth of what I say. I once lodged in the country during the summer, where I used to see a man go by the window every day, making all the wry faces in the world, one day having the mouth and chin drawn up, another, like a "Cheshire cat." I wondered what all this meant. At last he called on me one day, because I suppose I was a London surgeon, to consult me. He was a respectable farmer, and a well educated man. He asked me whether it was possible for him to be cured? Most undoubtedly, I told him. Regulate your diet and bowels; take a less quantity of wine than you have been accustomed to (for he was in comfortable circumstances); in short, keep your system as quiescent as possible. By attention to these circumstances he became quite well, as you will see by the following anecdote, which he afterwards told me:—"I returned," he said, "to the country, (for he was a man of fortune, and farmed his own estate) and met a surgeon in the market, who had formerly attended me. I said to him, 'Doctor, I will buy sixpennyworth of pears, and lay you a bet that I eat my half of them before you will yours.'" Whether he gained the bet or not I don't know, but the surgeon was astonished, and said to him, "I thought that you could not venture to eat pears." To which he replied, "Six weeks ago, I could sooner have done as Mucius Scevola did, thrust my right hand into the fire, than have taken a cold pear into my mouth." Now, I have seen several cases of this kind.

'The most severe case which I ever saw, was in a physician of this town, who suffered for many years the most excruciating agonies, and at last died. The nerve was so cut about, that he said himself, when he shaved, or was shaved, the skin was quite insensible. The pain in these cases is mostly produced in the trunk of the nerve, and not in the branches. I do not myself think division of these of any use, but rely on the constitutional treatment of the disease.

'I once divided a nerve in a lady's finger for the tic douloureux. The pain was so great that she could not put her hand into her pocket; she had cramps of the muscles, and spasms, and, in fact, I was afraid that she would have lock-jaw. The complaint continued for many years, gradually augmenting in severity, and I thought the case would justify the division of the nerve. The temperature of the arm was above the natural standard, the pain extended up the whole course of the radial nerve, but it began from the extreme point. I cut down on the nerve, exposed it, divided it, and took away three quarters of an inch of the nerve on the second joint of the finger. It was a long time before she was physiologist enough to find out that the division of the nerve had done her any good, for she had all the pain for some time after, as before the operation. The arm above the part where the nerve was divided was particularly sensible, and the pain was referred to the end of the finger. She became, however, a little better, the arm regained its natural temperature; the pain subsided, and she lost all those general nervous feelings to which she had for so long a time been subject. But this unfortunate girl died a year afterwards of extensive disease in the abdominal viscera. Now I say, that I have seen several cases of this kind, and I am convinced that the treatment of tic douloureux should be constitutional treatment, and such as is calculated to allay the irritability of the nervous system. It seems to me as truly a constitutional disorder, as either gout or rheumatism. In the physician's body, whose case I mentioned just now, no organic disease could be found in any part. In many cases which have been examined, no organic change could be found; the complaint consisted in functional derangement, and not in any structural change.'

The following passage from another lecture, is of more general importance than may strike the reader at first sight; it derives also a particular interest just now, from its application to the case of the young Princess Victoria:—

'Well, but about the mis-direction of weight; that is, the weight not falling upon the arch of the foot, but falling on the tibial aspect of the leg and foot. O, that's a very bad thing indeed. There you see the internal ligaments are strained; they are strained amazingly, and they elongate.—That is what you see very commonly in growing lads, and particularly those who carry weights on their shoulders; in bakers' boys, for instance, you see the foot turned out, the internal muscles turned in, the knee—I do not know whether it is not called baker-knee'd or not—the knees approximating to one another; so that it is of the utmost consequence to keep the weight of the body bearing on the astragalus and middle of the arch of the foot. You may say, hang these chaps, I do not care much about them; but I will tell you of a set of patients who you will care about: a young lady has her foot distorted, the muscles strained, and, as you will find, the round head of the astragalus coming out of the bed of the os naviculare; if the foot is twisted out, it will necessarily bring the knee inward; and there is a case you will care about. Consulted by people of wealth and opulence, and distinction, "How am I to do with my daughter; could you recommend irons, or what is to be done?" Now I say to them just this: "I would recommend your daughter to observe how she walks, and to take care that the weight of her body rests on the middle of the arch of the foot. I would recommend her not to walk with her toes turned out, but with them as straight forward as she can, for that is one of the things which gives cause to the weight to fall on the inside of the astragalus." In general you observe dancing ladies with their toes very much turned out, and I say, O, you must give up dancing, and do not turn your toes out at all. Then another thing to be attended to is, that you may heighten the inner quarter of your shoe, and that will help your weight to fall on the middle of the arch of your foot. You know that putting a strap round your shoe, and fastening that strap round your leg, is tantamount to the inner quarter of the shoe being heightened. If those things do not succeed in preventing the evil, why then you must have recourse to machinery, to irons, and so on; but I can tell you, after having seen a multitude of those cases, there was no necessity for irons at all, and by merely attending to those simple rules, and avoiding letting the weight rest where it ought not to have rested, they have grown up with ankles that were not materially wrong; the weight became transmitted to the astragalus, very much as it ought to be.'—P. 311.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

THE BROTHER.

When the Sun walks upon the blue sea waters,
Smiling the shadows from yon purple hills,
We pace this shore,—I and my brother here,
Good Gerald. We arise with the shrill lark,
And both unbind our brows from sullen dreams;
And then doth my dear brother, who hath worn
His cheek all pallid with perpetual thought,
Enrich me with sweet words, and oft a smile
Will stray amidst his lessons, as he marks
New wonder paint my cheek, or fondly reads
Upon the burning page of my red eyes
The truth reflected, which he casts on me:—
For he is like the Sun,—giving me light,
Pouring into the caves of my young brain,
Knowledge from his bright fountains.—Thus it is
I drink in the starry truth,—science and art,
And Learning pale doth crown my thoughts with flowers,
And Music waiteth on me sad and sweet,
And great Imagination, for my sake,
Lets loose her dreams and bids her wonders flow
By me,—until I talk in poetry! ALCANZOR.

GENERAL YERMOLOW.

As this officer is reported to have revolted against the iniquitous Russian despot, our readers may be pleased to see the following account of him, from the Memoirs of his friend and fellow-patriot Don Juan Van Halen:—

'On the 5th at day-break, we commenced our march through a country, to the beauty and variety of which no pen could ever do justice; and on the following day, towards evening, we approached Andreïewsky. Before reaching the city, the troops halted and suddenly formed, when I found that the general-in-chief Yermolow had, unaccompanied by any one, advanced on foot to meet this column. As all the troops of head-quarters, the officers on the staff, and the general-in-chief himself, were bivouacking before Andreïewsky, the battalions which had just arrived also pitched their tents there. I waited till the following day to present myself to the man whom I was most anxious to know; and meantime, profiting by the kind invitation of the major of one of the regiments with whom I came, I spent the night in his tent.

'The cannon announced the dawn, and I then beheld from the camp, which stood on an elevated spot, one of the most splendid sights I had ever seen, formed on one side by Andreïewsky, and on the others by fertile vallies and picturesque mountains. The body of officers with whom I had performed the last stages of my journey, and myself, went to present ourselves to the general at six o'clock, the hour appointed on the proceding night for our visiting him. The tent of the general was what is called in the country a kivitka. It is in the form of a dome: the lower part is composed of a sort of trellis-work in wood, very light but solid, about five feet high; the top is made of rather thick osiers; and the whole is covered with a thick impenetrable cloth, manufactured in the country. It had a door on one side, and a sliding window on the other. Its diameter was between twenty-five and thirty feet.

'On our drawing near, an aide-de-camp of Yermolow came out to meet us, and conducted us to the general's kivitka, which was furnished with a camp-bed, a table, and two chairs. Yermolow embraced the chiefs and officers with whom he was acquainted, and who had made with him the last campaign against Napoleon, and afterwards addressed himself to the whole circle, in the middle of which he stood in that martial attitude by which he is so much distinguished, entering at some length into the subject of the present war, and making humourous comparisons between the French campaign and that of the Caucasus, as well as on the diversity of objects offered by each. During his discourse, I observed the countenances of those by whom he was surrounded (among whom were officers of great merit), and it gave me pleasure to see that they were expressive of sincere attachment and respect; sentiments which, among the military class, are entertained only for those who, in the midst of bivouacs, lavish the noblest sacrifices to their country.

'Yermolow appeared to be about forty years of age. He is a very tall man, but well proportioned; has a vigorous constitution, and an animated countenance, the expression of which at once stamps him as a man of superior mind. When he received us, he wore a military frock-coat with a red standing collar, epaulettes, and the riband of the order of St George at the button-hole. On his bed lay a sabre, and a foraging cap, which completed his usual campaign dress. When the officers retired, he motioned me to remain. I had observed him sufficiently to be convinced that I might dispense with delivering my letters of recommendation to him, unless he himself alluded to them. The general, after congratulating me on my safe arrival, and welcoming me to head-quarters, entered upon the subject of my regiment, which he represented as being in the best possible condition, though in a state of inactivity, owing to the kind of warfare in which his army was at present engaged, in a mountainous country, where no regular cavalry troops could be employed to advantage, the country itself furnishing such horsemen as they stood in need of. I expressed a wish to render myself more useful, and took my leave of him, having first received an invitation to dine with him on that day.'

'On reaching the general's quarters, we found that the dinner had been ready an hour; but as he was on this day engaged in preparing his despatches for the Emperor, in which he usually gave the most circumstantial accounts of the operations of his army, we still found time to spare. General Yermolow, usually called by his Christian name, Alexis Petrowitch, is always his own secretary, confidant, and counsellor. According to the opinion of several distinguished persons of the capital, his confidential correspondence with the Emperor Alexander is of the highest interest, as it is replete with sublime sentiments, patriotic views, disinterested advice, and impartiality; this modern Belisarius having no other ambition than the true prosperity of his country, and the splendour of his sovereign's throne.

'Whilst this indefatigable chief was thus engaged in his numerous duties, I walked with several officers in the garden belonging to the tower, which, being on an elevated situation, commanded many fine prospects. In passing through the dining-room I observed at the head of the table a plate of soup which was quite cold, and I was informed that the general never ate anything hot, his dinner being usually served long before he sat down.'

* * * * * * *

'I thought, from all that I had heard respecting the treacherous character of the inhabitants of Asia, that General Yermolow appeared too careless of his personal safety, by absenting himself from us, and venturing beyond the reach of a sentry, accompanied only by some of the country people, probably spies, who, like the rest of the inhabitants of the Caucasus, never part with their daggers even in their sleep. I made this remark to some of the officers, who replied, that the general trusted so much to the respect which he inspired even to his most inveterate enemies, that he never thought of danger; and he was moreover persuaded, that were he to act otherwise, he would lose much of the prestige he enjoyed among a people, who prize nothing so highly as personal courage.

'Yermolow spends most of his afternoons in active occupations, and generally in the company of the young aid-de-camps, whom he takes a pleasure in forming; but to none of whom he ever shows the least partiality, which frequently excites jealousy, and spreads disunion among the officers of an army. His orders, whether written or verbal, are intrusted by him to the one who happens to be near his person.

'I have learned from persons who have known General Yermolow from his youth, that he always took the greatest pleasure in literary pursuits, and is deeply read in the classics. It is not surprising then if, with his studious babits, he should detest both drinking and gambling, the last of which, so difficult to repress among his countrymen, he never tolerates. Indeed, it is the only thing in which he is intolerant, particularly if he feels any esteem for the person addicted to this vice.

'In the evening, when the friends who form his society withdraw, and his occupations permit it, he returns to his books and papers; and as he never uses a watch, he seldom quits his studies till the sentry stationed near his window, who is purposely placed there by his friends, reminds him of the lateness of the hour, by the noise he makes when he is relieved. He then throws himself on his couch, and before cannon announces the dawn, he is already on foot and visiting the camp. Such is the invariable conduct of a man bearing the weight of a multitude of cares, fatigues, and responsibility, in the most extensive and complicated government of the Russian empire, especially at a time when its southern frontiers are in a state of insurrection. To treat the soldiers as if they were his own brothers; to spare their blood as much as possible, and insure and consolidate their successes; to make himself loved and respected by all those under his orders; to be neither rash nor timid, as says the Latin motto of his coat of arms;—such is Alexeï Petrowitch to his friends and his enemies.

'The baneful influence exerted by Russia in the affairs of my unhappy country, and the total impossibility of my again finding an asylum in that empire, must render unsuspected the sentiments which I here avow, and which are dictated only by a regard for truth and impartiality, and by the respect I feel for a man whose public and private virtues render him an object of general esteem and admiration, except only to a few envious courtiers, inimical to the true interests of their country.'

After Van Halen had served with the Army of the Caucasus for some time, and gained the confidence and esteem of his General and brother officers, it appears that the court of St Petersburgh found out that they had got a liberal in their ranks, and consequently an order, signed by the Emperor Alexander, is dispatched to Teflis, requiring his immediate arrest and expulsion from the Russian territory. The feeling manner in which General Yermolow breaks this unwelcome intelligence to him; his intimation that he will take on himself the responsibility of not enforcing the more humiliating part of his instructions; and finally, the handsome way in which the General, on parting, insists on Van Halen's using his purse, and his name if necessary, complete the picture of this gallant, liberal, and enlightened soldier.

A BOROUGHMONGER.

A TENANT of the boroughmonger's declines letting a son enter his service, because he has better hopes for him:—upon which a dialogue ensues, which concludes thus:—

'Very well, friend; very well!' replied Mr Tyrrel, foaming with rage. 'Depend upon it, I will remember you! Your pride shall have a downfal! God damn it! is it come to this? Shall a rascal that farms his forty acres, pretend to beard the lord of the manor? I will tread you into paste! Let me advise you, scoundrel, to shut up your house and fly, as if the devil was behind you! You may think yourself happy, if I be not too quick for you yet, if you escape in a whole skin! I would not suffer such a villain to remain upon my land a day longer, if I could gain the Indies by it!'

'Not so fast, your honour,' answer Hawkins, sturdily. 'I hope you will think better of it, and see that I have not been to blame. But if you should not, there is some harm that you can do me, and some harm that you cannot. Though I am a plain, working man, your honour, do you see? yet I am a man still. No; I have got a lease of my farm, and I shall not quit it o' thaten. I hope there is some law for poor folk, as well as for rich.'

Mr Tyrrell, unused to contradiction, was provoked beyond bearing at the courage and independent spirit of his retainer. There was not a tenant upon his estate, or at least not one of Hawkins's mediocrity of fortune, whom the general policy of landowners, and still more the arbitrary and uncontrollable temper of Mr Tyrrel, did not effectually restrain from acts of open defiance.

'Excellent, upon my soul! God damn my blood! but you are a rare fellow. You have a lease, have you? You will not quit, not you! a pretty pass things are come to, if a lease can protect such fellows as you against the lord of the manor! But you are for a trial of skill? Oh, very well, friend, very well! With all my soul! Since it is come to that, we will show you some pretty sport before we have done! But get out of my sight, you rascal! I have not another word to say to you! Never darken my doors again.'—Caleb Williams.

— Mr Dandridge, an English naturalist who lived about a century ago, was a renowned butterfly-hunter, and pursued his sport with such eagerness, as to give rise to some amusing incidents. On one occasion, a countryman at work in the fields, having for some time contemplated him, with his arms extended, hotly pursuing over hedges and ditches nothing, that he could see, at length took pity on the poor lunatic (as the man supposed him to be) overtook him in his mad career, and pinned him down vi et armis, that he might not run himself to death; the consequence of which was a bitter exclamation, that only served to confirm the countryman in his opinion,—"The purple Emperor's gone! The purple Emperor's gone!"

PERSECUTION.—It is not generally known that Fontenelle, in 1718, was on the point of losing his pensions, place, and liberty, for having published in France, twenty years before, what may be called 'An Abridgment of the learned Van Dale's Treatise on Oracles,' in which he had taken particular care to retrench and modify the original work, so as to give no unnecessary offence to fanaticism. A Jesuit had written against Fontenelle, and he had not deigned to make him any reply; and that was enough to induce the Jesuit, Le Tellier, confessor to Louis XIV, to accuse Fontenelle to the King of atheism (!)—Voltaire's Philosophical Dictionary.

THE PLAY-GOER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

DRURY-LANE.—The Brigand—The Legion of Honour—And Masaniello.
COVENT GARDEN.—The Carnival at Naples—Hide and Seek—And Neuha's Cave

DRURY LANE AND COVENT GARDEN.—THE ILLUMINATIONS.

THE recent extraordinary performances, at two great Houses which the Tatler is not privileged to criticise, have so absorbed the public attention as to render, for the moment, the mimic energies of Drury Lane and Covent Garden but of secondary interest, to Play-goers no less than to the rest of the community. It was at first announced that the above Theatres were to be closed last night, on account of the illuminations; but the Managers, on second thoughts, seem to have deemed it expedient to leave open these favourite channels of the people's feelings.

There was no novelty among the pieces selected, and therefore nothing to invite particular criticism. In truth, we know not what passed within the walls, but we guess that the Air, now more than ordinarily national, of 'God Save the King,' was the chief attraction of the evening, and that the enthusiasm which pervaded all ranks out of doors was partaken both by actors and audiences. In the streets, the theatre of our observation, the enlightened testimonies in approbation of the King and Reform seemed to afford to the gazers unmingled gratification; Every Man in his Humour seemed inclined to personate The Good-natured Man, from a persuasion that notwithstanding the late partial failure of the School of Reform, it could not but succeed on a second representation, aided as it must be by the popular WILL. F. F.

FRENCH PLAYS.

IT is now half-past twelve o'clock, and Madame ALBERT'S benefit just finished. The reader will consequently conclude that it will be barely possible to give any detailed criticism upon the evening's performance, seeing that three pieces were represented, and the delightful actress herself took part in all of them. They were Julien, La Fiancée du Fleure, and Les Rendez-vous Bourgeois. We have by turns sympathized with her touching and sweet sorrow and her passionate gushes of tears in the first, with her naïve and amusing coquetry in the second; and with her adroit and lively deportment as a managing chamber-maid, in the last piece. She is a charming little creature, and richly merits the ample encouragement and applause she received. The whole company have played with inordinate spirit and good humour; and as for LAPORTE, who handsomely took a character in each piece, we should feel gratified in compensating him for the month's laughter he has compressed for us into one evening. His personation of a River-God in costume, with a stone pitcher under his arm, was worthy of our own immortal MUNDEN.

'God Save the King' was played by the Band, after the first piece, and was received by the audience with that marked applause which none but a popular Sovereign can ever expect to obtain.

C.

A HUMAN DEVIL.—Oh God of mercy! If any man can resemble that malignant being who is described as actually employed in the destruction of thy works, is it not the persecutor?—Voltaire's Philosophical Dictionary.

— The word Alligator is said to be thus derived:—When the Spanish first saw this creature in South America, they called it Lagarto, which is the Spanish word for lizard. The English heard the name, and put the indefinite article before it, calling it a Lagarto; afterwards changed by quick pronunciation to Alligato; now Alligator.

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

COUNTERFEIT GOLD.—A German, Dr Hermstad, has discovered a mixture of metals, which is not only of the colour of real gold, but also possesses its hardness, all its ductility, and the same specific weight. The inventor, however, does not assert that it is as unchangeable as gold; and there can be no doubt that if he had met with that quality in it, he would not have failed to mention it; for in that case he would have found the secret which has been so long and so vainly sought by the alchymists. This material is thus composed:—Out of twenty-four parts, equal in weight, there are sixteen of platina, seven of pure copper, and one of pure zinc; this is to be covered wtth powdered charcoal, and placed in a crucible on a strong fire, until the fusion has reduced the three into one mass, which will be the said counterfeit gold.—Journal des Connaissances Usuelles.

CLERICAL ANECDOTE.—Some years ago, when the march of pulpit oratory was less advanced than at present, a number of pious parishioners resolved to compliment their beloved pastor with a horse, and after a great deal of scraping together and gathering up, they accumulated funds sufficient to purchase a saddle, which was forthwith dispatched to the minister, with an intimation that the horse would be sent to his worship at a more convenient season. Week after week, however, passed on, and no word of the minister's nag. This dilatoriness will never do, thought the reverend gentleman; and accordingly, one Sunday afternoon, he took occasion to introduce the subject, in winding up a thundering discourse on the unspeakable loveliness of Charity. "Now my friends;" said the preacher, "if that said horse be na nipping grass out by at the manse in a day or twa, I ken what I'll do!" Here the minister smote the pulpit in a manner that made the hearts of the congregation melt within them like wax—while he, stern man, continued his appeal to their pecuniary feelings so long, and repeated the fearful threat, "I ken what I'll do," so often, that one doughty heritor could suppress his alarm no longer. "And what the devil will ye do, sir," exclaimed he. "Why, man," said the minister coolly, "I'll just sell the saddle!"

ONE GOOD TURN DESERVES ANOTHER.—Santeuil, a poet of the 17th century, returning one night to the Abbey of St Victor, at eleven o'clock, was refused admittance by the porter, on the plea that the prior had absolutely forbidden the doors to be opened at so late an hour. A good deal of altercation ensued; at last the poet slipped a piece of gold under the door, which was quickly opened. When fairly in, he pretended he had left a book on the stone, where he had been sitting during the dispute, and begged the porter to go for it. Encouraged by the generosity of the poet, the man readily complied. In the meanwhile, Santeuil fastened the door; and the porter, half-naked, was obliged to stand knocking in his turn. "I cannot let you in," said the poet; "I am very sorry for it: but the prior has given positive orders not to have the doors opened at so late an hour."—"I let you in," said the porter, in a very humble tone. "So you did," replied Santeuil; "and I will do you the same good turn for the same price."—The porter not liking to sleep in the street, and fearful likewise of losing his place: slipped the piece of gold under the door again; saying, "I thought a poet's money would not stay long with me;" and so gained admittance.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

FRIDAY, APRIL 29, 1831.

When the Editor, whose health is not good, is prevented by illness from writing his usual articles in the paper, he is perplexed between the disinclination to speak of himself personally, and the wish not to be thought neglectful. At the present moment, however, he has particular reasons for stating that a severer fit of illness than usual prevents his attending to his duties.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

Inquiries of an Emigrant: being the Narrative of an English Farmer, from the Year 1824 to 1830; during which period he traversed the United States of America, and the British Province of Canada, with a view to settle as an Emigrant. Containing Observations on the Manners, Soil, Climate, and Husbandry of the Americans; with Estimates of Outfit, Charges of Voyage, and Travelling Expenses, and a Comparative Statement of the Advantages offered in the United States and Canada: thus enabling Persons to form a Judgment on the propriety of Emigrating. By Joseph Pickering, late of Fenny Stratford, Buckinghamshire. A New Edition, 12mo. pp. 132. Effingham Wilson.

When the question of emigration comes before us, we always think of the old impudent Tory jeer, "that those who do not like the country may leave it:" but thanks to the glorious measure now in progress, we think of the impertinence with more calmness than heretofore, in the full confidence that the time approaches when the spoilers will themselves be ejected, or at least rendered harmless; and that honest industry will again receive the fruits of its toil, without the painful necessity of self-banishment.

By those, however, who entertain thoughts of leaving this "best of all possible countries," we doubt not but much valuable information will be found in the little work before us. It is written in the form of a diary; and the author, who modesty disclaims any pretensions to fine writing, nevertheless states his facts in a clear and pleasing manner.

The comparative statements respecting Upper Canada and the United States certainly seem to show a balance of advantages in emigrating to the former; but still there is a very considerable drawback to which our English farmer hardly gives its due weight in the summing up; namely, that the United States possess the advantage of having the best government in the world, while the Canadas are ruled by a Lieutenant-Governor from England;—not but that the Government of the Canadas, though professing to be assimilated to that of England, is not in many respects very superior to it. They have there No Game Laws—No Tithes—No Excisemen; added to which, every person holding a deed of 40s. a-year freehold is entitled to vote at elections; and, "as land is so easily attainable, an industrious person may soon become a freeholder."

Though the author appears to entertain a tolerable portion of John Bull prejudice against the Americans, he cannot help making an important admission in the following paragraph:—

'A single glance down the banks of the Niagara tells on which side the most efficient government has resided. On the United States side large towns springing up; the numerous shipping, with piers to protect them in harbour, coaches rattling along the road, and trade evidenced by waggons, carts and horses, and people on foot, in various directions. On the Canadian side, although in the immediate vicinity, an older settlement, and apparently better land, there are only two or three stores, a tavern or two, a natural harbour without piers, but few vessels, and two temporary landing places. Farm houses there are all over the district, nearly one on each farm, and probably the farmers, &c. doing very well. A town cannot be built, as government retains the land for fortifications.'

In an introductory chapter, the causes of the present widely-prevailing distress among the industrious classes, and the consequent desire for emigration, are thus enumerated:—

'The first and by far the most prominent motive is privation, and its consequent distress. The next, perhaps, is dissatisfaction under real or fancied political grievances. Some few emigrate for a warmer, dryer, or healthier climate, and others for no reason but a love of change.

'Formerly religious persecution was the chief cause of expatriation, but happily that barbarous age is gone by; yet, unfortunately, there is another cause of late years in operation, although not of so violent a character, more dangerous from its insidious and constantly increasing power.

'That this privation and distress should occur to thousands and tens of thousands, in a country the richest on earth, the most flourishing in arts, manufactures, commerce, and agriculture, is of so anomalous and glaring a character, that it forces itself on the attention of every one.

'I have not the ability to exhibit a full elucidation of a cause of such magnitude; but as it has the effect of driving so many of my countrymen yearly into exile, I may be allowed a few words on the subject of this extraordinary state of things.

'The chief source of the evils complained of, is the accumulating immense wealth into large masses; virtually monopolizing (since the introduction of steam power and other modern machinery) the means and sources of the middle and lower classes, like large globules of quicksilver swallowing up small ones within their sphere of attraction.

'In the first place, is not this incontrovertibly the case with respect to the soil, the primary and only solid source of wealth of most countries? For instance, are there one half the number of proprietors and occupiers of land now in England there were thirty or forty years ago? Is it not a notorious fact that large landed proprietors buy up all the small farms and lots of land they can meet with? I have known parishes that had forty or more small proprietors and occupiers of land, where now there is not more than one third of that number; the remainder generally become labourers, nearly their only resource, throwing an extra quantity of the article of labour into a market sufficiently supplied, and, consequently, depreciating its value below a just and equitable price, the landlord and fundholder reaping the benefit from the depreciation. But it will be asked, why will farmers give a greater rent than they can afford? I answer, because those farmers, that still have a little money left, must rent a farm at some price; they cannot do anything else; all other trades and occupations are already overdone. The landlord is enabled to keep up his high rents by throwing three or four farms into one, thereby creating a competition, by reducing the number in the market; while, as I before said, two or three of these farmers must, probably, go to the parish; the one that gets the enlarged farm will curtail his expenses to meet the high rent, by reducing the number of labourers kept on the four farms; thus he impoverishes the farm, and that in return impoverishes him, until perhaps in a short time his resource also is the same degraded station, the parish.

'I by no means intend unqualified censure to any class,—for it is not reasonable to expect landowners will take low rents while they can get high ones, any more than any other classes will dispose of their property at a less value than it will bring in the market. It is the business of legislators, by wise enactments, to regulate, either directly or indirectly, those matters, and prevent unjust monopoly.

'In manufactures, some of the arts, and navigation, this monopolizing system, chiefly through the aid of steam power, is still more apparent Suppose, for a moment, that, within ten years from the present date, one-third of the human labour now required in Great Britain be superseded by machinery, in addition to the present amount, there would then be nearly half the population unemployed, or unprofitably employed, the evils of which, if not counteracted, must overwhelm the country in inevitable confusion: in a word, means of living must be found, either without or with labour. Capital, in conjunction with machinery, is rapidly, though silently, creating a greater revolution in the kingdom than was ever done by politics. How can these evils be avoided, it may be asked, or would I have machinery destroyed? To destroy machinery, I answer, would be retrograding towards barbarism; and who could say to what extent it should be carried, even if practicable? In fact its destruction could only be effected by the united consent and power of every country; which I need not add can never be obtained. Nor is its destruction necessary to the happiness and welfare of the world; but that it may prove a blessing instead of a curse, it must be reduced from a mountain torrent to fertilizing streams. How this is to be accomplished is worthy serious attention. I shall not presume to enter deeply into it, but only suggest a few hints. A recurrence might be had to the old system of cottages and small farms. If in each parish every farm that is over 200 acres were divided into two, there would be then, on an average, four or five farms more in each township, requiring as many extra farmers to occupy them. These farms, when divided, would probably employ more labourers in proportion, and the land be kept in better condition than before. In conjunction with this, let a number of neat and convenient cottages be built in each parish (if there are not enough already) and three or four, to eight or ten, or more acres, of land, be attached to each by the rich land-owner, the parish, or act of Parliament, to be let to the most industrious and honest part of the labouring class, allowing at least one-half to be retained in arable, for potatoes, other vegetables, and grain. These, with a little assistance and indulgence at first, would pay as much rent per acre as a farmer. By this means labour would be taken from the present overstocked market, and poor rates proportionably reduced. A stimulus would be given to industry and honesty in the lower classes, from aspiring to those cottage farms, and thence to a higher grade; from being now degraded nearly as low, and as incapable of emancipating themselves and rising in the scale of society, as the unfortunate African.

'By the cottage and small-farm system, in conjunction with an adequate and permanent abatement of rents, in proportion to the price of grain, all the present population might be beneficially employed. The former would be a kind of reserve of labour, to which recourse could be had by the farmer in busy times, to the mutual benefit of each. To check the monopolizing system in land, and to give efficacy to the cottage and small farm system, let a graduated tax be levied on all occupiers who retain in their possession more than 100 acres, to be appropriated to the use of the poor; this would effectually put a stop to the system now in practice, of holding more than can be cultivated to the best advantage to the country, and would, perhaps, keep three or four families, and employ double the number of labourers it now does, if divided and conducted with energy. Numbers of large farms might easily be pointed out at the present moment, capable of keeping a great increase of stock, and producing much more grain than they now do. The want of capital is, perhaps, the chief obstacle that prevents large farms being cultivated to the best advantage; nine out of ten of their occupiers have had their capitals reduced by these retrograding times, and, unwilling to lose any of their dignity or appearance in society, continue to occupy them, though at a certain loss. To counteract the growing and pernicious influence of immense monopolizing capitals, and further to relieve the poor and industrious classes, let taxes be taken off every article and commodity of general utility, and the necessaries of life, and put on property and luxury only.

'Whatever difference in opinion may be held respecting the causes of the frequent embarrassments of the agricultural and manufacturing interests, and the more severe privations of the labouring classes, all must acknowledge its frequent existence, and the paramount necessity of an adequate and speedy remedy. Whether our rulers, or any body of the people, take the case up seriously, before it manifests itself in a more forcibly convincing manner, remains to be seen. But if they do not, emigration appears to me the only remedy in the hands of those who may have sufficient money to carry them out of the influence of the evil—out of the country.'

WINDOW-BREAKING AND COUNTY RATES.

TO THE TATLER.

DEAR MR TATLER,—A friend of mine, this morning, when I told him that there were more windows broken in certain houses than were left whole, replied, "What a shame it is to destroy a man's property, simply because he is not of the same opinion as you are." This friend of mine was not aware, nor was I till just now, that all windows thus destroyed are repaired out of the County Rates! Do you not think, Mr Tatler, that this (though "pretty to observe") is rather too bad? Let those who are sulky and borough-mongering, take the consequences; and believe me,

Dear Mr Tatler,

Your friend, their enemy,

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

A REGRET FOR SIR WALTER.—It is a great pity that there are no longer possessed magicians or astrologers. We can conceive the cause of all these mysteries. A hundred years ago all the nobility then lived in their castles; the winter evenings are long, and they would have died of ennui without these noble amusements. There was scarcely a castle which a fairy did not visit on certain marked days, like the fairy Melusina at the castle of Lusignan. The great huntsman, a tall black man, hunted with a pack of black dogs in the forest of Fontainebleau. The devil twisted Marshal Fabert's neck. Every village had its sorcerer or sorceress; every prince had his astrologer; all the ladies had their fortunes told; the possessed ran about the fields; who had seen the devil or could see him; all these things were inexhaustible subjects of conversation, which kept minds in exercise. In the present day we insipidly play at cards, and we have lost by being undeceived.—Voltaire's Philosophical Dictionary.

A TRAGEDY IN THE RADACK ISLANDS.—The fine weather induced me, on the 3d of May, to visit Langediu on the Island of Ormed. He received me with the greatest joy, and offered me his most costly treasures as presents. The children, grand-children, and great grand-children of the good old man assembled round his house, and represented a dramatic piece for my amusement, in which Langediu himself played a principal part, and astonished me by the animation of his action and singing. As this was one of the best representations I have seen in Radack, I shall describe it, in the hope that my readers also will not be uninterested in it. The number of the dramatis personæ was twenty-six, thirteen men and thirteen women, who seated themselves in the following order on a spot of smooth turf. Ten men sat in a semi-circle, and opposite to them ten women in a semi-circle also, so that, by uniting the points, an entire circle would have been formed; but a space of about six feet was left at both ends, in each of which sat an old woman provided with a drum. This drum, made of the hollow trunk of a tree, is about three feet long, six inches in diameter at each end, narrowed, like an hour-glass, to about half that thickness in the middle. Both ends are covered with the skin of the shark; it is held under the arm, and struck with the palm of the hand. In the middle of the circle, old Langediu took his station with a handsome young woman, sitting back to back. The whole party were elegantly adorned about the head, and the females about the body also, with garlands of flowers. Outside the circle stood two men with muscle horns. The hollow tones of these horns are the signal for a chorus performed by the whole company with the violent movements of the arms, and gesticulations meant to be in consonance with the words. When this ceased, a duet from the pair in the middle, was accompanied by the drums and horns only; Langediu fully equalling his companion in animation. The chorus then began again, and this alternation was repeated several times, till the young songstress whose motions had been growing more and more vehement, suddenly fell down as dead. Langediu's song then became lower and more plaintive: he bent over the body, and seemed to express the deepest sorrow; the whole circle joined in his lamentations, and the play concluded. Deficient as was my knowledge of the language, I was still able clearly to understand the subject of this tragedy, which represented a marriage ceremony. The young girl was forced to accept a husband she did not love, and preferred death to such an union. Perhaps the reason of Langediu's playing the part of the lover, might be to give the more probability to the young bride's objections and resolution.—Kotzebue's New Voyage round the World.

ACCOUNT OF A BEAUTIFUL GEORGIAN GIRL.

The dinner invitations of General Yermolow during a campaign are perfectly unceremonious; indeed, so much so, that the guests are often ignorant of the precise dinner-hour. In our way to the general's quarters, my comrade and myself, wishing to see something of the city, walked through several streets, in one of which we observed two women looking out of a balcony, and earnestly beckoning to us. We were the more surprised at their appearance, as we believed that the Mahometan women of the Caucasus, like those of Persia, were strictly confined to the interior of their houses, or that, at all events, they never went unveiled, a custom which we found was not general among the inhabitants of the Caucasus. We, however, entered the house, and saw in the court two Russian grenadiers, who, by a mistake of their corporal, had taken their quarters here, and whose presence was the cause of the inquietude manifested by the two ladies, who, with an old man, were the only inhabitants of the house. Whilst the soldiers were explaining these things to us, they appeared at the top of the stairs, and again renewed their invitation by violent gesticulations. On a nearer approach, we guessed by their age that they were mother and daughter. The former, who still preserved much of the freshness and beauty of youth, wore very wide trowsers, a short tunic, and a veil, which fell in graceful folds on her back, while round her neck she had some valuable jewels, though badly mounted. With respect to the daughter, who was scarcely fifteen years of age, she was so extraordinarily beautiful, that both my companion and myself remained awhile motionless and struck with admiration. Never in my life have I seen a more perfect form. Her dress consisted of a short white tunic, almost transparent, fastened only at the throat by a clasp. A veil, negligently thrown over one shoulder, permitted part of her beautiful ebony tresses to be seen. Her trowsers were of an extremely fine tissue, and her socks of the most delicate workmanship. The old man received us in a room adjoining the staircase: he was seated on the carpet, smoking a small pipe, according to the custom of the inhabitants of the Caucasus, who cultivate tobacco. He made repeated signs to us to sit down, that is to say, in the Asiastic manner, a posture extremely inconvenient for those who, like ourselves, wore long and tight trowsers, whilst the two beautiful women on their side earnestly seconded his request. We complied with it, though it was the first time that either of us had made the essay. The ladies, having left the room for a moment, returned with a salver of dried fruits, and a beverage made of sugar and milk; but I was so much engaged in admiring their personal attractions, that I paid but little attention to their presents. It appeared to me an inconceivable caprice of nature to have produced such prodigies of perfection amidst such a rude and barbarous people, who value their women less than their stirrups. My companion, who like myself was obliged to accept of their refreshments, remarked to me, whilst the old man was conversing with them, what celebrity a woman so transcendently beautiful as the daughter was would acquire in any of the capitals of Europe, had she but received the benefits of a suitable education.

Having remained with them a short time, during which they repeatedly expressed their alarm at the sight of the military, who were seen about the streets, we endeavoured to quiet their apprehensions, and recommending the soldiers to protect them from any insult, we left the house, to which I should often have returned, during my sojourn at Andreïewsky, had it not been that we were total strangers to each other's manners. We learned afterwards, that this family were not Mahometans, but belonged to those Jews who had settled many centuries back in the Caucasus.—Memoirs of Don Juan Van Halen.
